and was about to pass through the room, when her mother spoke to her. "Annie," she said, "we want you to give your opinion of this Easter dress." Turning to look at it, the girl exclaimed, "How lovely!" and as she took in the simple, harmonious blending of the whole, she said, "Mrs. Jones, I think it is perfect."

"Well, Miss Annie, would you accept this as an Easter offering of peace from a cross old woman who has need of all the good-will that your kind heart can bestow?" And she bowed her head in her hands, while tears trickled slowly through her fingers.

Annie was so taken by surprise that she uttered no word, but when she saw the woman's grief, she went quickly to her side, and clasping her arms about her neck, kissed the trembling hands, saying she accepted the present as it was given, not so much as a peace offering, for she had never laid anything up against her.

After a few moments, Mrs. Jones raised her head, and, clasping Annie's hand, said: "Come to see me often, and I will try not to say those ugly things I have been wont to say to you."

Annie thanked her for the beautiful present she had given her and told her she hoped to see her at the service the next evening.

Then Mrs. Raimond took her by the hand, bidding her try and look on the brighter side of life, for she felt that this new Easter morn would bring healing and comfort to her bruised and weary heart. So the poor woman left them feeling quite a little comforted.

"Oh!" exclaimed Annie, as she viewed herself in the mirror, "I never expected to have a dress that suited me so well. It is just what I wanted."

The next evening, when all were assembled on the platform that were to take part in the exercises, Annie saw Professor Jones and his wife enter, followed by a stranger. As they took their seats Annie noticed that Mrs. Jones sat between the men; the change that had come over her was wonderful, her face was almost radiant, and the worry and care had fallen from her as though some genie had transformed the sickly old woman into another being. But speculation had to cease as the evening's programme was being rendered. Annie's was the closing piece, and she stepped forward, with a graceful bow. She soon carried the audience with her, so vivid were the pictures she portrayed of the mother and divine Child in the manger, the wise men from the East, Christ grown to manhood, going about his Father's business, healing the sick, cleansing the leper, lifting up the fallen, debating in the temple, casting out the money-changers, raising Lazarus from the dead—doing all in his Father's name. The latter part of the recitation portrayed his enemies, his own people crying, "Crucify him! Crucify him!" the sorrowful day when the veil of the temple was rent in twain and the crucified Saviour laid in the tomb, the poem ending with a wonderful burst of song and thanksgiving from the whole choir—"Christ hath risen! Christ hath risen! Glory to God in the highest, and good will to men." With a bow Annie retired to her seat.

For a moment a hush fell upon the congregation, then murmurs of "Wonderful!" "Wonderful!" were heard on every side.

After the services were over Annie was deluged with congratulations, but her greatest pleasure was when Professor and Mrs. Jones introduced the stranger. "Annie," said the old lady, "I wish to present to you my son that was dead, and now is alive." The stranger came forward and shaking hands with our little heroine, laughingly said he felt very much alive, and appreciated the treat that had been given him on this first night of his arrival home.

Sabbath Benefits*

THERE is great fear expressed by some of God's people that America will become a land without a Sabbath. They are led to this view by the constantly greater latitude which Christians are allowing themselves in their keeping of the holy day; and by the immense influx of Sabbathless immigrants.

Every one who reads history is impressed by the futile attempt of the infidel French revolutionists of 1793 to have a rest-day once in ten days instead of once in seven. They had thought that they could even abolish the Sabbath altogether, but they found this code so injurious that they were compelled to abandon it. It is generally conceded by farmers that horses and oxen need, quite as much as men, a rest-day each week.

On tablets recently excavated, it is made certain that the ancients, even as far back as the Hittites, early discovered the need of such a rest-day, and that their monarchs commanded it.

In country districts and small towns, a Christian may spend his Sabbath restfully and healthfully, without the temptations which beset those in the large cities. His church is generally near at hand; or if it is far he has usually a conveyance in which he can easily reach it. He has a quiet drive or walk to the house of God. In the afternoon, if there is no service, he may walk in meadow or wood, with his family about him, or with his religious weekly or a good book in hand. Most of us can recall such Sabbaths, full of quiet hours of reflection upon sacred themes, of calm enjoyment of God's fresh air, of pure and grateful rest. But to the dweller in cities, especially to the poor in the crowded tenements, such Sabbaths seldom come. They usually find him amid scenes of disorder, often of drunkenness. He may attend some morning service at church or chapel, but, though he has probably been closebound in a dark shop or office every day during the past week and pines for the fresh air, he has to ride for an hour or more in some car before he can reach any green breathing-spot.

Even there, he is likely to find a noisy crowd, with merry-go-rounds and shooting galleries on every side. Vaudeville shows and moving-pictures tempt him. In order to find peace, he must go back to his close living-rooms, seldom worthy of the name of "home," and lock himself in.

The problem of the poor man's city Sabbath grows yearly more complicated. The parks are full; the near-by beaches are black with people; saloons and evil resorts are stretching out their slimy tentacles to entrap the weak and the unwary; rag-time music supplants hymns, drowns all conversation and almost prevents thought. And yet the unfortunate dwellers in the slums, like those who live in the more respectable sections, should enjoy their rest-day in the pure out-of-doors.

It does not behoove those more fortunately situated to judge too harshly that portion of our population which the sociologists call "the submerged tenth"; or even the social stratum just above that one. To most of them is now granted freedom from toil on one day of each week. This rest day is in nine cases out of ten the first day of the week. How shall they, with their limited means, spend it in order to obtain the most health for body, mind and soul?

And for the remainder of us, the so-called educated classes, the question is, perhaps, almost as difficult—how shall we best spend these beautiful "first days," in order to grow in spiritual stature and in favor with our God?

Help from Without*

THERE are many homely proverbs which illustrate the value of good surroundings and especially of good companions. Perhaps "Birds of a feather flock together," is one of the most effective. If you go with a certain "set," you will not only be classed with them in the minds of others, but you will gradually come to resemble them.

None of us is good enough to disregard this great truth. Our occupation sometimes forces us to associate with low people. Sometimes we have to live with them. Sometimes we engage in missionary work among them. But when we choose our companions for ourselves let us select those of high Christian ideals. When we go with others, we must wear all of the armor so eloquently described by Paul in the last chapter of Ephesians. We shall need it, for Satan well understands that he can work upon our souls most successfully through our social affections.

Man was made for society as much as for solitude. He cannot safely shut himself away from his kind. In the swift and turbid current of active life, he can best learn the art of the strong swimmer. He must face the world, and he must learn to face it right.

In one of Horace Bushnell's most spiritual sermons, he dwells eloquently upon this subject: "There are no fires that will melt out our dross and corrupt particles like God's refining fires of duty and trial, living as he sends us to live, in the open field of the world's sins and sorrows—its plausibilities and lies—its persecutions, animosities and fears—its eager delights and bitter wants. How necessary it is for the soul to be aired in the outward exposures of the world! Here alone can true Christian purity be cultivated. Alas for the man who is obliged to be shut up to himself, as in monastic life, to face his own disorders and passions, and strangle them in direct conflict, with nothing else to occupy the soul."

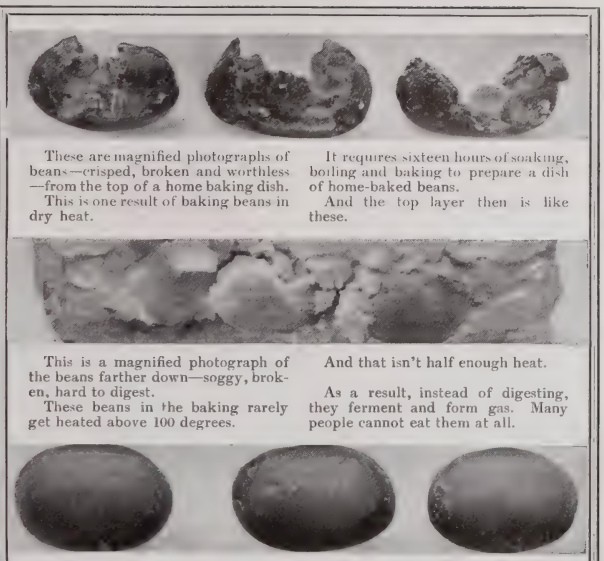
"There must be," he says, "community in the great fundamental moral and spiritual ideals, if there is not to be tragic failure in the friendship. It is as though Paul said, 'I would save you from the bitterness of finding yourselves bound up in the most intimate relations of life with those who cannot sympathize with you in your highest aims and aspirations. There is small promise of a satisfying love where each despises the ideals of the other."

Conversely, as unworthy friendships lower us, noble ones elevate us.

Mrs. Browning once asked the saintly Charles Kingsley, "What is the secret of your life? Tell me that I may make mine beautiful, too."

He replied, "I had a friend."



Remember the saying of Solomon, "He that walketh with wise men shall be wise."

Saadi, the famous Persian poet, wrote, "A friend of mine put into my hands a piece of scented clay. I took it and said to it, 'Art thou musk or ambergris? for I am charmed with thy perfume."

"It answered, 'I am a despicable piece of clay, but I was for some time in the company of the rose. The sweet quality of my companion was communicated to me. Otherwise I should be only a bit of worthless clay, as I appear to be."

The great Archbishop Leighton wrote, "Do not keep company with any sin. It may surprise thee as an enemy sometimes, but let it not lodge with thee as a friend."

* Topic of the Epworth League for Sunday, April 23. TEXTS: II. Cor. 6: 14-17; I. Tim. 5: 22; Ps. 1: 1-3.

These are magnified photographs of beans—crisped, broken and worthless—from the top of a home baking dish. This is one result of baking beans in dry heat.

It requires sixteen hours of soaking, boiling and baking to prepare a dish of home-baked beans.

And the top layer then is like these.

This is a magnified photograph of the beans farther down—soggy, broken, hard to digest.

These beans in the baking rarely get heated above 100 degrees.

And that isn't half enough heat.

As a result, instead of digesting, they ferment and form gas. Many people cannot eat them at all.

This is a magnified photograph of Van Camp's Beans—nut-like, mealy and whole. Every bean in every can is like the three we show.

Each separate bean, during all the baking, gets 245 degrees of heat. As a result, these beans quickly digest. But we use steam ovens, and the beans come out in this ideal condition.

A million homes are serving Van Camp's, not from mere convenience. They like them better than the two kinds shown above. And so would you.

Questions and Answers

R. D., Germantown, Pa. What was the worst plague of history?

A virulent form of typhus which turned the body black and caused rapid putrefaction. On this account it was called the "Black Death." It broke out in 1348, and devastated the world almost, sweeping from China across the whole of Asia and Europe to the British Isles. In Europe alone it claimed almost 3,000,000 victims. London became as a vast charnel-house, scavengers going along the streets shouting, "Bring out your dead." As graves could not be prepared for all, hundreds of bodies were thrown together in heaps and allowed to decompose, exposed, so that the air became poisoned with miasma and deadly effluvia. Over 150,000 died in the city.

J. A. B., Decatur, Ia. How will the parties be divided in the new Congress?

The Senate stands, Republicans 50, Democrats 41, vacant 1. The House, Democrats 228, Republicans 160, Socialists 1, vacancies 2. In the last Congress, in the Lower House, the Republicans had 217 and the Democrats 174.

M. A., Bloomington, Ill. What is the present situation with regard to the timber lands of the United States?

According to the report of the Bureau of Corporations, 195 holders control about one-half of all the standing timber owned by private individuals. Three big concerns own eleven per cent. of it. The United States Government owns only one-fifth of all the standing timber in the country, whereas forty years ago it owned three-fourths. It sold in comparatively recent years timber lands for $1.25 per acre that are now worth $60 an acre.

G. M. H., Goff, Kan. Is there any authority for the statement that the power of healing through Jesus' name ceased with the death of those on whom the apostles laid their hands?

No one has authority to dogmatize on the subject. The church, however, holds that the power of healing was confined to apostolic times. At the same time, there have been many well attested instances of the healing power in modern times. A celebrated divine, Professor David Smith, D.D., writing on this subject, says: "To each man there is given one and only one life; and if he wastes it, and then repents and is forgiven, Christ does not give him a second life. He says to him: 'Take up your wasted life, and repair it and fashion it anew; and I will pour upon it my healing grace.' It is because we fail to recognize this law that we are discouraged by the difficulties of the Christian life, and wonder if there be any reality in salvation when we find the old passions so strong within us after we have believed. After we have repented and believed, our old lives, so broken and mutilated, are the material which we must work with, and, by the aid of the Holy Spirit, repair and refashion."

A. F. C., Brinamwood, Wis. I find Hong-Kong given as one of the important cities of the world. Still all descriptions show it to be an island, whose chief city is Victoria. Please explain.

This is due to the confusion of the name of the entire British colony with that of the city. The port with its little town was known as Hong-Kong before the British occupancy, and the old name still persists. The entire settlement, including Stanley, a watering place on the island, and Kau-lung, a residential suburb on the mainland, are now included in the general name, which is accepted and used even by the best authorities.

Mrs. H. L., Payette, Idaho. Please tell the origin of the Dutch Reformed Church.

The former title of this denomination indicated its historical relations—"The Reformed Protestant Dutch Church in North America." It is "Reformed," as distinct from Lutheranism; "Protestant," as protesting against Rome; "Dutch," as originating in Holland. In 1867, by an almost unanimous vote of the General Synod, the name was restored to its simple and original form—"The Reformed Church." The word "Dutch" was originally introduced to distinguish the church from the "English" church, by which name the Episcopalian denomination was generally known in New York since the Dutch colonial government had surrendered to the British in 1664. The Reformed Church of the Netherlands grew from the great Reformation. Gansevoort and Agricola had preached doctrines similar to those of Luther, fifty years before he broke away from Rome. Their followers worshiped in private houses until about 1563, when the Synod of Antwerp was held. This adopted the Belgic Confession, and laid the foundation for the noble Reformed Church. The first Reformed Church in America was organized in New Amsterdam (New York) in 1619.

Mrs. M. E. B. Knowing your paper to be so widely read and interested in every humane work, I write to ask if you will not say something to prevent the dreadful brutalities practised on dumb animals in the name of science by vivisectionists.

We have repeatedly advocated the passage of laws regulating vivisection and rigidly preventing unlicensed persons from making experiments. Whenever vivisection is performed, it should be in the hands of licensed practitioners of experience and no others. We have no sympathy with those who torture dumb brutes needlessly, and would favor severe measures to restrain and punish such cruelties as have been publicly exposed.

H. P., Wilburton, La. The March 22, 1911, edition of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD makes the statement: "Nothing is impossible with God." Do you mean that God can do anything, or do you make a mental reservation in making the above statement?

God is omnipotent, which attribute is sufficient to cover all possibilities that the human mind can conceive of. Some sophists urge that not even God can efface the past and its record. This is merely a logical quibble, of course. The Scripture itself tells us that he cannot lie (Heb. 6: 18). All power dwells in him and such power he exercises in accordance with his will and in the direction of sovereign beneficence.

A. B. C., Boston, Mass. Will you please tell me how much of my estate will go to my husband at my death? I have money and real estate of my own. I have brothers and sisters, but no children. Would you advise me to make a will?

Counselor David Paine, New York City (to whom we referred this letter), answers as follows: "Under the laws of Massachusetts, where the wife dies without making a will, leaving brothers and sisters, but no children, the husband shall receive $5,000 from the personal property, if the estate is of sufficient value, and one-half of the remaining personal property. If the estate is not of sufficient value, the real property, if any, can be sold to make up the necessary $5,000. In addition to this, the husband receives one-half the remaining real property, unless he elects to hold one-third of the real property for life, which he is at liberty to do. He thereby forfeits his right to the one-half remaining realty. Unless this disposition of the estate is satisfactory to the inquirer, it would be advisable for her to make a will."

Roses, Chrysanthemums, and all the other kinds of beautiful and fragrant flowers are necessary, but no home is quite complete without some ferns. Easy to take care of, strong and healthy, with reasonable care they will develop into fine specimen beauties.

We have selected four choice varieties of house decorative plants that we know you will enjoy and appreciate. They are well rooted plants, ready to pot, each one sure to add a bright, cheerful spot to your home.

Read this Description of the Ferns:

Whitmani Fern. It has very distinct characteristics of its own, in size, shape and growth. Each frond is delicately and finely cut, like the ostrich plume; it is frequently called by that name. Its feathery, drooping form and compact, luxuriant growth will brighten any surrounding. It is a healthy, vigorous grower, constantly unfolding fresh fronds, which rapidly grow to a width of from two to twelve inches.

Boston Fern. This is one of the best known ferns in cultivation and said to be the standard American decorative plant. It is known by some as the Fountain Fern, which name it derived from its graceful drooping habit of growth. The fronds of this plant frequently attain a length of four feet, making it one of the best house plants to grow as a single specimen for table or pedestal.

Asparagus Sprengerii. There is always a place in every home for this fern and it is one which will make the most rapid and vigorous growth with the least care or attention. The fronds are very slender, of a deep green shade, growing five or six feet long in a single season. It is one of the best pot or basket plants for house culture and will thrive under almost any condition of soil or treatment.

Hardy Russian Violet. Of all delicate perfumes that of the violet is the most delicate and delicious and places this modest little flower among the popular favorites. This variety is an extra strong grower and if kept in a cool situation will produce flowers of a deep rich blue through the dead of winter, without any trouble whatever.

An Indian Chief

A Scene at Meal Time in the Paraguay Forests

The Witch Doctor

AMONG SOUTH AMERICAN SAVAGES

By JOHN HAY

Director of the Inland-South-America Mission

DAY after day she lay in front of our door and literally starved to death. As we sat eating our own food this starving woman lay at our door. In vain we pleadingly entreated her to eat and live. The superstition that held her in its grip was stronger than the pangs of hunger; and at last, from the skeleton frame, already unconscious in the apathy of an awful despair, the soul of the untaught Indian woman went forth to meet God! But let me tell the whole story:

I had moved with my family to a new station, and had just finished building our house at Riacho Negro on the river Paraguay when a company of redskins arrived from a district about sixty miles west of us. While they were busy putting up for themselves a rude shelter of palm leaves, grass, twigs, and sticks we found there was a sick woman among them and that they had sent for a witch-doctor to come and drive out the evil spirit which they supposed was causing the sickness. When the medicine-man arrived he and some of the older men of the tribe, each armed with a hollow gourd containing a few pebbles, seated themselves around the patient as she lay on a deer-skin on the ground with a palm log for a pillow, and the weird "sick-chant" began in deep guttural ejaculations of the syllable "uh" uttered in staccato to an accompaniment of the gourd rattles. The motion was slow at first, but the movement increased in speed as the men worked themselves into a frenzy of excitement, till with perspiration streaming from their bodies they bent low over the sufferer, the strong pulsations of their throats sounding like thudding hoof-beats on the ground, and finally stopping from sheer want of breath. This was repeated at intervals till morning.

Next day the skin of the patient was punctured in places with a bone lancet and the witch-doctor sucked large quantities of blood from the victim's body. All this proved fruitless, and the next step was starvation. This was supposed to make the evil spirit leave the sufferer in search of something to eat.

The awful terror and loathing expressed in the eyes of this poor untutored victim of savage superstition were simply heartbreaking. As the days passed the numbness of despair replaced the look of terror, and then all was still. The legs of the poor creature were at once doubled in two against the body, which was then wrapped in the woman's small skin skirt and tied with cords into a bundle about two and a half feet long.

Some of the Indians with wooden diggers scraped a small hole in the sand on the bank of the river for a grave. It was too small to admit the little bundle, but the men simply laid it on the top and tramped it in with their feet. Still using their feet they filled in the earth and tramped it down on top!

Later, I witnessed a very different scene. Some years of missionary work had intervened, and an epidemic of measles was raging among the Indians. The people in the districts around the mission stations, where we could not reach them, were dying in hundreds without medical or spiritual succor, and on all the mission stations but one the missionaries' hands were full, tending to the sick. The Indians on that one station decided they would ask God to keep the sickness from them, and though the missionaries could not believe it possible for them to escape these people had more faith than their tutors. They said: "Don't you teach us that whatsoever we ask in His name he will do?" So they gathered every night in the palm-log church to ask God to keep the sickness away. Then they came along to my wife, who was the medical missionary on the station, and stood in a row in our sitting-room while she gave each a dab of quinine on the tongue. Then in perfect assurance that all would be well they would lay themselves down in quietness to rest till morning.

The terror of evil spirits causing sickness gave place to the peace of God, who says, "No plague shall come nigh thy dwelling." The sickness at that time spread around the station on every side and finally spent itself, but not a person on the station was touched with it. Verily, "the Gospel of Christ is the power of God!"

As fast as funds will permit the Inland-South-America Mission, which is an undenominational organization, is reaching out to repeat the same work of love and redemption amongst the three hundred Indian tribes that still await evangelization. The present ambition of the union is to equip a new station among the forest Indians in Paraguay. These people are almost prehistoric in their savagery. They are still in the stone age, using stone axes and many other crude implements, and their mental and moral progress is in about the same primitive state. There are consecrated men and women ready to go to these yet unreached tribes if there were but the available money to send them and support them. We are praying that an all-wise Providence will supply the $10,000 that are needed to establish two new stations in Paraguay. These Indians are susceptible to the highest and best development when given spiritual and educational advantages.

The American Pulpit

A SERMON BY

Rev. Richard W. Jungfer*

Acceptable Prayer

TEXT: Matt. 20:20-28

WHEN Solomon ascended the throne of his father, he hastened to Gibeon, to bring a sacrifice to the Lord. God appeared to him in a dream by night and said, "Ask what I shall give thee." Solomon praised God, as it was only due to his grace that he was king over a powerful nation. Continuing he said: "Give therefore thy servant an understanding heart to judge thy people, that I may discern between good and bad: for who is able to judge this thy so great a people?" This pleased God. Solomon, like many others, might have wished for wealth, power, influence, long life and other earthly things. God said therefore: "Because thou hast asked this thing and hast asked for thyself understanding to discern judgment, behold, I have done according to thy word: lo, I have given thee a wise and understanding heart, so that there was none like thee before thee, neither after thee shall any arise like unto thee. And I have also given thee that which thou hast not asked, both riches and honor." God was pleased with Solomon and his prayer, but not so with the mother of Zebedee's children, who desired of Christ: "Grant that these my two sons may sit, the one on thy right hand and the other on thy left, in thy kingdom." He answered her: "Ye know not what ye ask."

The Impossible Prayers

Many prayers are spoken, which God does not answer for just this reason. Our children ask things of us, which we must refuse for the same reason. If these were granted, they would do positive harm. We are children in understanding, and also ask for things harmful. We should be very careful when we pray for the things of this world. We should never fail to add: "Not my will, but thy will be done."

It is different, however, when we ask for heavenly things. It is God's will that his kingdom may increase, that all sinners may be saved, that his will may be done by all. We can pray for increase of faith, love and hope, as we know that this is God's will. We can pray for these without constraint. We can be sure that all such petitions are pleasing to God. We learn of our text that we can pray for faith. The wife of Zebedee was the mother of James and John. She was a woman who believed in Christ and his kingdom. As yet there was nothing to be seen of his kingdom. The oppressors of the Jews were still in full power. Herod the Wicked ruled in Galilee; Pilate, the detested, in Judea. The garrison was of Roman soldiers. Jesus had made no political effort to erect his kingdom; still she believed he had the power and ability and would establish it at no distant date. Even when Jesus was made a captive, when he was abused in the most shameful manner, even when he suffered death on the cross, her faith never wavered. She was one of the few faithful who were standing under the cross until he breathed his last.

"O Ye of Little Faith!"

Our faith fails at a mere trifle. Our faith is shaken when we are abused and ill-treated, and when we see others so treated. Was Jesus not abused and ill-treated worse than we? Yet this mother believed in him. We are disheartened when we see infidelity and unbelief triumph, when we see how the populace is growing more indifferent in spiritual matters, and how it is leaving the church to follow the world. But should we lose our faith on that account? Everybody turned against Jesus. Judas became a betrayer, Peter a denier, and the rest of the disciples forsook him in his hours of trial. Infidelity and hatred triumphed as never before. Yet this mother believed in him. We see our best efforts misunderstood and misconstrued. We see our love rewarded with hatred and calumny. Then we are apt to sigh with Elijah: "It is enough; now, O God, take away my life." Let us not do so. Jesus himself had the same experience. Let us remember that Christ predicted all this. As we know by the swelling buds that spring is near, we shall also know that as infidelity and apostasy increase the end of the world is coming. As the former is the sign of spring, the latter is of the coming end. Jesus said that his disciples would suffer even death. These words are being fulfilled.

Have faith! Pray for faith! What is man without faith? He is like a vessel which has lost her rudder and is being thrown hither and thither by the angry billows of the sea. A man without faith is like a mariner without his compass. The Indians out West tore the eyes out of their victims, and stripping them would drive them out in the glaring sun to their destruction. A man without faith is blind and stripped of his best, destined to go to his everlasting ruin. The wise men of the East would never have found their way to Jesus, the new-born King, had it not been for the guiding star. No mortal would ever find Jesus and heaven if it were not for the guiding star called faith. Without faith we may not be saved. "Believe," says the apostle, "and ye shall be saved." A man who has no faith in himself will never succeed. Napoleon had faith in himself; his soldiers had faith in his leadership; therefore they were victorious. Let faith be your most precious jewel. With faith in Jesus, you will vanquish all enemies and gain the victory. Do pray for faith! Pray with the man of the multitude: "Lord, I believe; help thou my unbelief" (Mark 9: 24). In the eleventh chapter of Hebrews you will find the most beautiful definition of faith ever written: "Faith is the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen. . . . Without faith it is impossible to please God, for he that cometh to God must believe that he is, and that he is a rewarder of them that diligently seek him." Then the apostle goes on to speak of Enoch, Abel, Noah, Abraham, Sarah, Isaac, Jacob, Joseph, Moses, and says that whatever these did they did by faith. It is even so to-day. The Reformation was a work wrought by faith. Oh, let me beseech you, pray for faith. Christ said to him who was stricken with the palsy: "Go, take thy bed, thy faith hath helped thee." All things are possible if one has faith. Christ said, "If ye have faith as a grain of mustard seed, ye shall say unto this mountain, Remove hence to yonder place, and it shall remove." Ah, beloved, pray for faith. Such will please our heavenly Father.

Cheerfulness in Suffering

Besides this, we can pray that we may be kept cheerful in suffering. This mother brought her sons and said: "Grant that these my two sons may sit, the one on the right hand and the other on the left, in thy kingdom." But Jesus answered and said: "Ye know not what ye ask. Are ye able to drink of the cup that I shall drink of and to be baptized with the baptism that I am baptized with?" They say unto him, "We are able." Jesus refers in this figurative speech to his suffering and death. They express most cheerfully their willingness to suffer for and with him. Jesus saith unto them: "Ye shall indeed drink of my cup and be baptized with the baptism that I am baptized with." And this came to pass; when after Pentecost they began to preach the Gospel in the power of the Holy Spirit, they were imprisoned and persecuted. James was the first to suffer death for his Master. John was the only apostle who died a natural death. Yet even he, in his old age, was compelled to go into exile. Paul, the chosen vessel of God, suffered much. Read the account of his suffering in II. Corinthians 11, from the 24th verse on. It is impossible that any one suffered more than he. Still there was no one who was more cheerful, more happy than he. Now, if Christ says to us: "Are ye able to drink of the cup that I drink, and to be baptized with the baptism that I am baptized with?" let us answer with a cheerful heart, "Yes, we are." If troubles and trials do come, let us bear them cheerfully as promised. Like Job let us say: "What? Shall we receive good at the hand of God, and shall we not receive evil?"

Tried as by Fire

Now, why does God send us suffering? To make us better. To make us perfect. When silver is melted, it is left on the fire until one can see his image in the metal. Then it is taken off. We are created in the image of God. Being brought in contact with the world, this image is being effaced. Peter speaks in his first epistle of fiery trials, i. e., trials which act like fire. God therefore puts us in the melting-vessel of fiery trials, and leaves us over the fire until he can see his image in us. When coins leave the mint, they are shining. But, brought in contact with the wear of the world, they soon lose their lustre. It takes rubbing and polishing to bring it back. We are to shine, yea, even as bright lights, but sometimes our lustre grows very dim. God therefore burnishes us with suffering that we may shine with his light. The Bible says: "For whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth." We are punished of our sins. Let no one say he has no sin. All who speak thus belie themselves, and the truth is not in them. It is the very debased, the most depraved who speak thus. Those who know themselves will admit their failures. St. Paul knew well why he was obliged to suffer "the thorn in his flesh." He says: "Lest I should be exalted above measure," i. e., that I may not become proud and sin, "there was given to me a thorn in the flesh." Instead of decrying his condition, he says: "Therefore will I rather glory in my infirmities, that the power of Christ may rest upon me." Oh, let us pray for this spirit! I have met men who said: "I have received much punishment as a boy, but I thank my father in his grave for every chastisement he gave me." The time will come when all will thank God for the received chastisement. Those who grumble in their affliction form a sorry spectacle. They are objects of derision. Let us drink the cup with cheerfulness.

The Strength of Affliction

Cheerful sufferers have great power over man. They are looked upon as marvels. They preach a powerful sermon. Their influence is great, such as that of Fanny Crosby, the blind poetess, and Frances Willard, who suffered terrible pain. A man who will not brave a storm is a coward. A worse one is he who does not brave the storms of life. A fruit tree, growing in a hothouse, where no wind or rain can reach it, never bears fruit fit for man's use. Put the tree outside, and the tempest will make it strong and fruitful. So do we become true Christian men and women if we brave the tempest. It is for this reason God sends us trials. Let us bear them cheerfully. God does not send us more than we can bear. Let us pray for this spirit.

God also sends us trials for other reasons. When the disciples saw the man born blind, they asked Jesus, "Master, who did sin, he or his parents, that he was born blind?" Jesus answered: "Neither has this man sinned, nor his parents, but that the works of God should be made manifest in him." Think of it! God chooses us to glorify him. What a privilege! Bear it cheerfully. Listen what Peter says: "For I reckon that the sufferings of this present time are not worthy to be compared with the glory which shall be revealed in us." Again he says: "Now I rejoice in my sufferings." Abraham said to the rich man tormented in hell, "Remember that thou in thy lifetime receivedst thy good things, and likewise Lazarus evil things. But now he is comforted, and thou art tormented." Let us bear whatsoever God sends us with good cheer. We must take up our cross and follow Jesus.

"For I Have Given You an Example"

Then we can pray for humility. When the ten heard of the proceedings of Zebedee's wife they were moved with indignation against the two brethren. Why? Because they were not humble. Jesus soon appeased them. Calling them to him he said, "Ye know that the princes of the Gentiles exercise dominion over them, and they that are great exercise authority upon them. But it shall not be so among you; but whosoever will be great among you, let him be your servant: even as the Son of man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and to give his life a ransom for many." He was the Son of God, invested with all power in heaven and on earth. He gave his disciples an example of his humility. He took off his dress and girded himself with an apron, and began to wash their feet. This was work the slaves were left to do. He said: "Ye call me Master and Lord, and ye say well; for so I am. If I then, your Lord and Master, have washed your feet: ye also ought to wash one another's feet. For I have given you an example [in humility], that ye should do as I have done to you."

And What Then?

A CERTAIN good man was living at a university, when a young man, whom he had known as a boy, ran up to him with a face full of delight, and told him that what he had long been wishing for above all things in the world was at length fulfilled, his parents having just given him leave to study law. Thereupon he had come to the law school at this university on account of its great fame, and meant to spare no labor or pains in getting through his studies as quickly and as well as possible. In this way he ran on a long time; and when at last he came to a stop, the good man, who had been listening to him with great patience and kindness, said:

"Well, and when you have got through your course of study, what do you mean to do then?"

"Then I shall take my doctor's degree," answered the young man.

"And what then?" asked he.

"And then," continued the youth, "I shall have a number of difficult and knotty causes to manage, shall catch people's notice by my eloquence, my zeal, my acuteness, and gain a great reputation."

"And what then?" repeated the holy man.

"And then," replied the youth, "there can't be a question, I shall be promoted to some high office or other; besides I shall make money and grow rich."

"And what then?" repeated the good man.

"And then," pursued the young lawyer, "then I shall live comfortably and honorably in wealth and dignity, and shall be able to look forward quietly to a happy old age."

"And what then?"

"And then," said the youth, "then I shall die."

Here the holy man again asked, "And what then?" Whereupon the young man made no answer, but cast down his head and went away. The last "And what then?" had pierced like a flash of lightning into his soul, and he could not get clear of it. Soon after he forsook the study of law, and gave himself up to the ministry and spent the remainder of his days in godly words and works.

The question which was put to the young lawyer is one which we should put frequently to ourselves. When we have done all that we are doing, even supposing that all our highest dreams are accomplished, that every wish of our heart is fulfilled, still we may ask the question, "What shall we do? What shall we be then?"

Whenever we may cast our thoughts forward, never let them stop short on this side of the grave; let them not stop short at the grave itself; but when we have followed ourselves thither, and have seen ourselves laid therein, still ask ourselves the searching question, "And what then?"

We should indeed have this spirit of humility. Christ says: "Who exalteth himself shall be abased, who humbleth himself shall be exalted." At another time the disciples quarreled among themselves who should be first. Christ placed a child in their midst, and said: "Unless ye become as a little child [so humble], ye shall not enter heaven." The Lord says of himself: "I am meek and lowly in heart." If Christ is humble, it behooves us to be so. "God resisteth the proud and giveth grace to the humble," says Peter. Humble yourselves, therefore, under the mighty hand of God, that he may exalt you in due time.

Christ says: "To sit on my right hand, and on my left, is not mine to give, but it shall be given to them for whom it is prepared of my Father." Those who believe in Christ; those who take upon them his Cross; those who minister. These are they, the ones who follow Christ, for whom heaven is prepared by God, and it will be given them

The Progress of World Peace

WHAT HAVE I TO DO WITH IT?

By EUGENE THWING

A FIVE-CENT piece, held near enough to the eye, can obscure the sun. A little military demonstration on our own Mexican frontier is so filling the American eye just now that the rising sun of a world-wide peace is for the moment somewhat obscured.

Nevertheless, the peace movement is gathering force and making rapid progress on both sides of the Atlantic. President Taft awakened new interest by his speech in Washington advocating the importance of a comprehensive treaty of arbitration between Great Britain and the United States. Sir Edward Grey, the British Foreign Minister, evoked enthusiasm at home and cordial response throughout Europe by a remarkable speech in favor of disarmament and arbitration. The French newspapers and even the German official press extended a hearty welcome to the movement.

KING GEORGE is deeply interested, and is said to cherish a hope that his reign may be made notable by repairing the injury inflicted upon Anglo-Saxon unity by George III. No king could have a loftier ambition than to be a strong leader of his people in ways of peace and good will—to be "the repairer of the breach, the restorer of paths to dwell in."

In London a national peace council has been formed to set afoot a national demonstration in support of Sir Edward Grey's policy for a rapprochement with Germany, and to demand acceptance of President Taft's proposal for the settlement of all disputes, including those relating to the national honor and territory, by arbitration. The Archbishop of Canterbury is one of the leaders in this movement.

American clergymen and leaders of thought are joining eagerly in the work of rousing public sentiment. "If the Church can take up such a magnificent work for humanity," said the Rev. Arthur H. Judge, rector of St. Matthew's Church, New York, "and can bring it to a successful issue, it will have done much to justify its existence in the eyes of the common man. It would prove that it has power to do great good for civilization and humanity."

"ALL the civilized world," declared the Rev. Henry Mottet, New York, has been watching with intense interest these two great men, the President of the United States and the Foreign Secretary of Great Britain. They have been working hand in hand to bring the English-speaking world together and hasten the time when men "shall beat their swords into plowshares and their spears into pruning hooks; nation shall not lift sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more."

Miss Anna B. Eckstein, of Boston, is helping on the great peace movement in a very different way. She is scouring Europe for signatures to an enormous petition for international arbitration and disarmament. Miss Eckstein is full of animation, intelligence, and determination. She has set herself the task of getting two hundred million signatures to her petition to be presented at the next Hague Conference in 1913. At the last Conference she presented a petition containing two million signatures. She is receiving hearty co-operation everywhere she goes.

Andrew Carnegie's great gift of ten millions of dollars as a permanent peace fund appears to be accomplishing results by mere psychological forces. Adjutant-General Verbeck issued a statement the other day complaining of the difficulty in securing enlistments for the army, and declaring that the military spirit in America is at a low ebb. He gave several reasons, the first mentioned being the influence of Andrew Carnegie and his ten-million-dollar peace fund. Mr. Carnegie, naturally, was delighted, and responded with an interview in the New York World declaring that "the statement of Adjutant-General Verbeck is one of the greatest compliments I have ever received."

"THE day will come," said Mr. Carnegie, "when an educated young man asked to enlist in the army and to promise to shoot down his fellowmen whenever he is ordered to, as a profession, will say to the tempter: 'Is thy servant a dog, that he should do this thing?' The typical heroic soldier who rallies to the flag of his country when it is attacked is found in men like Washington, Grant, Sherman and Sheridan. They were pursuing peaceful avocations when the call came. One was a surveyor, another a tanner, and another a professor in a university."

Peace between nations can never become a reality, however, until peace has taken actual possession of the hearts of individual men. Presidents and Foreign Secretaries, ministers and millionaires can lead the great movement, but the man on the street, in the shop, in the office, in the pew, in the home, must "seek peace and pursue it." Peace is not a large and intricate theory. It is a simple matter of man and man. Nations can never "follow after the things which make for peace" until the individual men who make the nations get more of the last twelve verses of the twelfth chapter of Romans into their dealings one with another.

WE STAND too much outside of these great questions and discuss them as if they belonged to everybody else but ourselves to settle. We must talk peace everywhere we go, to be sure, but most of all we must live peace. Bickerings and dissensions in family life, in church work, in business, must stop. How are we to be cooing doves in international affairs if we constantly practise the habit of war in our daily domestic and social affairs? We are fond of quoting unctiously the Scripture phrases that seem to apply to large issues between nations, and we long for the time to come when war shall cease and "peace on earth, good will to men" shall be the law of governments. That glad time is coming, but it will be hastened if you and I shall recognize now and apply in our own lives the truth "how good and how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity."

His Unanswered Prayers

IN THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of March 29, Rev. C. W. Stephenson, Detroit, Mich., asks: "Shall we not thank God sometimes that he has quite as often said no as yes to our unwise and narrow petitions?"

My answer to above question, from the bottom of my soul, is, yes. I am one of those who thank God daily that he has not granted some of my most ardent prayers and wishes. And it is experience, personal experience, that makes me say this.

If God had granted my prayer I would not have had the good and noble wife that made my life one of the happiest on earth. If God had granted my earnest wish I would have gone into a business which I thought I would be able to manage successfully, but in which—as I found out in after years—I would have made a sad failure by not having the necessary experience. This would have made an unhappy man of me for the rest of my life.

If God had granted my ardent prayers for the life of my beautiful first-born son when he was taken sick when nine months old, I never would have been the man I am now; I would have remained a good-for-nothing fellow, a disgrace to my family. But when I stood with my dear, despairing wife at the cradle containing the lifeless body of our only child, the question arose in my mind, why has God taken this beautiful child from us? why has he not granted my prayers for the life of our dear child?

Then, suddenly, a low voice spoke to my soul: "Thou shalt not have any other gods beside me." This voice brought me to my knees. Yes, I always prayed; prayed for earthly, material things, but never for spiritual blessings. We had made this child our god, our idol. Here, at the cradle of our only treasure, my eyes were opened. Here I found my Saviour; he comforted me in my great affliction so that I was soon able to say, "Thy will be done."

Since then I have thanked God—more than for all other rich blessings he has bestowed upon me—for that day when he opened my eyes and made a new man of me.

And it is yet like a miracle before my eyes—from that day on my material circumstances changed. From a poor man who had tried hard for years to gain a foothold on the first rung of the ladder to a successful business career, but always in vain, I gradually advanced to a firmly established business. It was as if an invisible hand had opened the road for me and led me on from one success to another. Yes, thanks to God for the prayers he does not grant; he knows best what is good for his children.

I never speak of these experiences to anybody, not even to my own family; but it may be that some "burdened and heavily laden souls" may receive a little comfort from them; therefore I have answered the question of Rev. Stephenson by some of my experiences.

THE CALL OF THE FIELD

LIST to the call of the field,
Yoho! my farmer boy;
Come, break the stubborn glebe,
And whistle your tune of joy.

List to the call of the field;
Honor its present need;
Go draw your furrows long and deep
And scatter precious seed.

List to the call of the field,
It will call to you soon again;
For, after toil and waiting,
You may gather golden grain.

The fields of the world are calling,
They are rank with the weeds of sin;
Come, break the stubborn glebe of doubt,
And sow the good seed in.

The fields of the world are calling,
Calling to you again;
For, by and by, if we faint not,
We shall reap the precious grain.

LENTEN EVENTS AT THE NATION'S CAPITAL

By ABBY GUNN BAKER

BETWEEN the two sessions of Congress—the closing of the Sixty-first and the opening of the extra session of the Sixty-second, which by the President's call will convene on the 4th of April — Washington society almost deserted the national capital. Immediately upon the adjournment, President Taft went South, to the golf links at Augusta, Ga., to get a much-needed rest. It is also possible that he wished to be away from the capital when the order was given for the mobilization of the United States troops on the Mexican border in order to rob the movement of the significance it might otherwise have had. At the same time Mrs. Taft and Miss Helen were in New York on a shopping tour, but returned the day the President left, that they might be ready for the musicale which Mrs. Taft gave in the East Room of the White House that evening. This was the first of a series which she will give during the spring season. They followed the President South the next day. Many of the diplomatists flitted to Atlantic City, Old Point Comfort, and other shore resorts, while the members of Congress seized the opportunity to hurry to their homes for a short stay.

The East Room musicales, such as Mrs. Taft will give during the spring, were introduced by Mrs. Roosevelt, and have proved among the most pleasant features of the social life of the White House. Every one knows of Mrs. Taft's devotion to music. As a girl she studied at the Conservatory in Cincinnati; later she helped to organize and for years was largely instrumental in maintaining the famous Philharmonic Society of that city. While she dropped her music to some extent after her marriage, yet she gave her children their music lessons while the family were in the Philippines, and has never lost her fondness for the art. When she became mistress of the White House one of the first additions she made to it was a splendid concert grand piano for the Blue Room and an upright one for the family sitting-room on the second floor. She also installed a cabinet gramophone, which has been a great source of delight to the White House guests.

To the East Room musicales there are usually from four to six hundred people invited. They are largely from official circles, although the President and Mrs. Taft have many friends among the residents of Washington, who are also to be found there. Mrs. Taft receives the guests in the Green Room at ten o'clock. After they have greeted the hostess they pass into the East Room, which is filled with light folding chairs for the occasion, and where the programme occupies an hour or a little longer. The President often comes in toward the end of the programme, and after it is over he mingles informally with the guests. Gradually every one drifts from the East Room through the long corridor and the state parlors to the large dining-room, where a dainty buffet supper is served. Soon after midnight (for the White House hours are always early) the guests depart without the formality of bidding the President and Mrs. Taft good-night.

Whether Washington society has simply been following in Mrs. Taft's wake or not, it is certainly true that musical entertainments of all kinds have been tremendously the vogue at the capital during the past year or two. Mrs. Bryce lent a room of the British Embassy for several such affairs; indeed, until she was completely swamped with requests and in self-defense had to decline to lend it at all. It is characteristic of Washington that for benefits for every imaginable kind of charity the prominent hostesses, from the White House to the outer ring of all circles of society, are besieged for their drawing-rooms. If only the White House, an embassy, or any other well-known doors are opened for a charity the drawing-room is sure to be filled to its limit, no matter how soaringly high the tickets of admission.

The Monday Morning Musical Club had the Playhouse for a series of pictures and tableaux the latter part of March, while the National Theatre was filled to the limit in mid-Lent for the Bardic recital and Ceilidh, which was given to raise a fund for some poor churches in the West. This latter event was largely patronized by the diplomatic corps and was a great success.

Women in the public eye—the wives and daughters of our public men—are often sweepingly classed as brainless butterflies, particularly if they are successful socially; but this is exceedingly unfair to many of them. There never was a time in the history of the world when so many women of wealth and position were interesting themselves in humanitarian objects as now, and the Washington women are fully abreast of their sisters elsewhere in this matter. In Congressional circles scores of women could be named who are actively identified with organizations for social betterment and for the study of economic questions, and it is the rare exception among them to find those who are not church members. The wives of three of the newer members of Congress could easily be included in the last statement; they are Mrs. Crawford, Mrs. Oldfield, and Mrs. Hanna.

Mrs. Crawford is the wife of the junior Senator from South Dakota, who had a distinguished career in his own State before coming to the Senate. A native Iowan, he went to Dakota in 1883, where he rose rapidly in his profession, the law. He was a member of the territorial legislature, later a member of the State Senate, and in 1906 was elected governor of the State. Mrs. Crawford is the daughter of Judge Robinson of Iowa City, and was graduated from the Iowa University, where she met Mr. Crawford when he was taking his law course at the same institution. They have three children of school age, and, by a former marriage, Senator Crawford has an attractive young daughter, who finished her collegiate course last June. Mr. Hanna, who has just completed his first term in the House, is one of the most successful business men of North Dakota, and has been a member of the State legislature and Senate since 1895. They have made their home at the Arlington Hotel since they have been in Washington, and their two bright daughters are of great assistance to Mrs. Hanna in her social duties. The family is Methodist, and Mrs. Hanna is active in church work. Both Mrs. Crawford and Mrs. Oldfield are stanch Presbyterians. Mr. Oldfield is entering upon his second term as a member of the House from Arkansas. They have no children, but those who know Mrs. Oldfield best say that her heart is big enough to take in all the children in the State of Arkansas. This was illustrated last year when one of the lads at the Naval Academy at Annapolis, an appointee of Mr. Oldfield's, was taken sick and died at the Academy. Had he been Mrs. Oldfield's own son she could not have given him more tender care.

A friendship of long standing has existed between President Taft and General Edwards. They are evenly matched at golf and are frequent companions on long cross-country tramps. Mrs. Edwards' health is not very robust, and for that reason she has not been as active in society this winter as usual. Mrs. Dennett, the wife of the Land Office Commissioner, is one of the most delightful hostesses of the official circle. Mr. Dennett is the scion of a family distinguished in the annals of the Church of England. His father had charge of the parish where King Edward spent his summers, and he was the minister of the court church.

The Guatemalan and Salvadorian legations have been in care of the Chargé d'Affaires for several months, as both Minister Herrarte and Minister Mejia are in their respective countries with their families. Minister Ritter of the Swedish legation has recently been joined in Washington by Madame Ritter and their infant son, who was born during her stay last fall in Switzerland. Madame Ritter is a charming little dark-eyed lady who has traveled extensively and who speaks English with scarcely any foreign accent. Before coming to Washington Minister Ritter was the Swiss Envoy Extraordinary at Tokio for several years, and the legation on Hillyer Place, in Washington, has numerous interesting Japanese wood carvings, embroideries, and other Oriental furnishings brought from Tokyo.

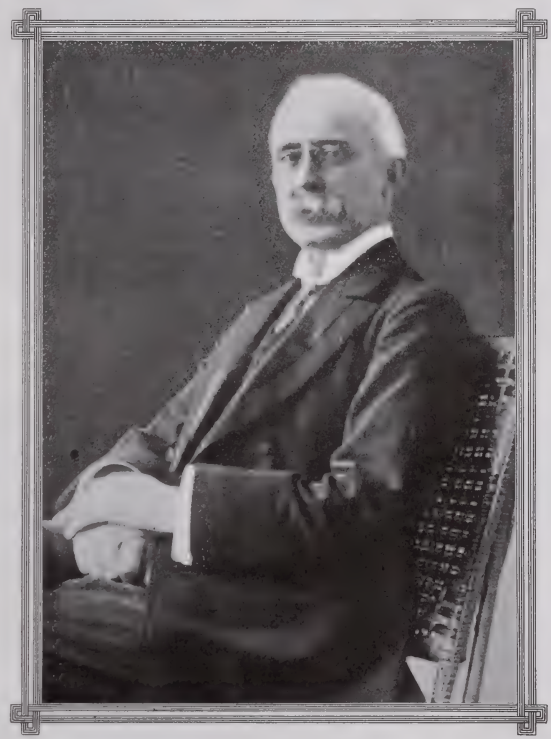
Dr. Jowett in an American Pulpit

Mrs. Jowett

THE first sermon preached in New York by the Rev. Dr. John Henry Jowett, the famous English pastor, was listened to by an audience that crowded the old Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church to its doors. It was a clear, simple, forceful exposition of the orthodox Gospel. He expressed the belief that institutional work was the foundation and should be the future path of the church's development. His text was Matt. 9: 36-38. In the course of his sermon he said:



"I think if Jesus were in New York or in any other large town to-day he would use the same figure of the lost sheep fainting by the way. If the Lord were to come to New York to-day and go into the circles of business he would find men worried, running about, restless, dissatisfied, sorrowful. I think he would look over the crowds of this city and say 'fainting sheep.' But I think he would also say, 'But oh, what a harvest ready for the reapers!'

"I wonder, if Jesus went into the gay social life of this city, whether he would not see, amid all the sham, breaking hearts, crushed hopes, lives of secret sin. He would say, 'Fainting sheep, so torn and yet so white for the harvest.'

"Jesus Christ sheds his blood in the rescue. He goes forth to suffer, to bleed, to sacrifice and to die. In him we have redemption. What a Gospel! And that's the Gospel I came to preach—the Gospel that saved me and holds me; that has made me the Lord's own servant; the Gospel which teaches that the infinite pity of Jesus is more than sufficient for the infinite need and pathos of human life.

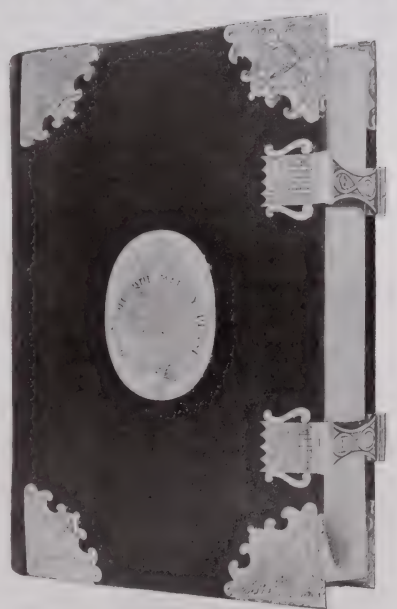
"The greatest poet who ever sang his songs said of the people: 'I hate the vulgar crowd.' A great soldier of history, when he viewed a certain city from a distance, said: 'What a city to sack!' Napoleon, with regard to people, was not bloodthirsty, but he was pitiless. The great Greek thinkers always tried to bribe and coerce the people, and they were without real human sympathy. But Jesus, when he saw the multitude, 'was moved with compassion.'

"Remembering that just before he was moved with compassion he had looked upon the multitude, first as fainting sheep, then as a great harvest ready for the reaper, I want to know what was in that compassion? What does pity constitute? I believe most earnestly that the first essence and cardinal prerequisite of pity is a cloudless sense of right, an incorruptible holiness. The conscience of Jesus was as luminous as the clear sky. Without clarity of conscience there can be no fine compassion. Whenever conscience begins to burn low compassion begins to shrink. I believe that the correlative element to the cloudless sense of right is a blazing antagonism to wrong. It is exemplified in lightning. The light of conscience changes into lightning whenever wrong draws near.

Dr. Jowett in His Study

"In the Lord's compassion there was, first of all, this cloudless sense of right, merged with a blazing indignation toward wrong. Next, he possessed a supersensitive conception of human suffering and infirmity. Like a standard seismograph, which registers not only earthquakes and violent shocks, but the smallest undulatory motions of the earth, our Lord registers everything; every sigh or groan uttered here is recorded indelibly on his big heart.

"But in the last analysis there must be even more in him who can be moved by compassion. Such a man must have the glorious purpose to ransom and redeem, moulded into a quenchless, restless passion to attain this end. He must shed his blood at the rescue.



"'Pray ye, therefore'—that shall be the first word to my new congregation, remembering that prayer is not words but work. Too often it is but a construction of words, words which are going about in this world with a lost sovereignty, with their power spent. And the word 'compassion' is one of these. The conviction which I hope to illumine is this: That whenever we pray for men who are in the grip of the world, in the grip of the devil, we shall understand that we are doing for those men vital work, fundamental work.

"The Great Shepherd of the sheep is here, and I pray that in this, my first sermon, we may gloriously find him."

BIBLE PRESENTATION TO KING GEORGE

PROBABLY the most interesting event that characterized the recent Tercentenary Celebration of the King James Version of the Bible the world over was the presentation of a magnificently bound and embellished copy of the great Book to His Majesty King George of Great Britain, together with an illuminated address. The presentation took place in the Throne Room of Buckingham Palace, on the morning of March 21. A deputation headed by the Archbishop of Canterbury, and representing all the Protestant denominations in the empire, waited on the King, who received each member in truly democratic fashion. There was no formality observed as at court functions, the King himself and his visitors wearing ordinary morning costumes. The address, a beautiful specimen of the lithographer's and printer's art, was read by the Archbishop. It dwelt upon the mighty results the Authorized Version of the Bible had accomplished in English-speaking lands, showing that much of the progress of civilization and enlightenment was due to the powerful influence exerted on the minds of the people by the great work of the translators, who comprised the world's foremost scholars and philosophers. The fact was emphasized that the Authorized Version had permeated literature and art and set a standard of pure speech, had helped to remove social wrongs and ameliorate the conditions of labor, had modified laws and shaped national character, and had fostered international comity and good will among men.

The Bible presented to the Sovereign represents the highest achievement of the bookmaker's craft. It is 11 inches by 7¼ inches, bound in rich purple velvet with silver mounts. It reproduces the binding of the copy of King James I.'s Meditation Upon the Lord's Prayer, which is preserved in the British Museum Library. In the new volume the King James coat-of-arms is replaced by that of George V. The silver corner-pieces are exact copies on a larger size of those on the older volume, and bear various crests and badges. On the upper cover can be seen the Tudor rose, surmounted by a royal crown, the crowned harp of Ireland, the crowned thistle of Scotland, and the crowned cross, the coat-of-arms of Cadwallader, last king of the Britons. On the lower cover the corner-pieces show a crowned fleur-de-lys, the crowned crests of England and Scotland, and also a crowned lion and a crowned harp.

The Superbly Bound Bible Presented to King George

The volume was presented to His Majesty by the Marquis of Northampton. In a few well-chosen sentences the King expressed his sentiments on the high mark of esteem shown him by the presentation of "the most valuable thing this world affords." He compared the King James Version to a broad light which came in the darkness, giving to the whole English-speaking people the right and power to search for the truths and consolations of faith. "The multiplying millions of the English-speaking world," said the King, "have turned in their need to the grand simplicity of the Authorized Version, and have drawn from its inexhaustible springs, wisdom, courage and joy."

All the religious bodies in the kingdom were represented, including the Salvation Army, Moravians and Friends. There were also present delegates from the leading universities, high commissioners from overseas dominions, and representatives from Bible societies in all parts of the English-speaking world.

MR. CARNEGIE'S MUNIFICENT GIFT

—Mr. Carnegie's liberality would seem to be boundless. It is reported that he has decided to give $10,000,000 toward the establishment of a great national university in Washington. This is a noble aim. Mr. Rockefeller has made many gifts to universities, and educators are certainly under great obligations to these two open-handed Americans. There is one object to which we should like to see some of our great donors address themselves. It is the establishment of a free sanitarium for consumptives on a scale commensurate with the great need for such an institution. Such a gift would be a blessing to thousands who are making an almost hopeless battle for life against the Great White Plague.

Our Relief Work in China

WITH the remittance of $20,000 cabled this week to China through our State Department in Washington, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Fund has now passed the $100,000 mark. This splendid result is due wholly to the golden-hearted generosity of our readers and their friends, whose gifts, under God's blessing, are doing a great life-saving work among the famine sufferers. Our good missionaries in Chin-kiang and their missionary allies throughout the two stricken provinces, together with the official Committee in Shanghai, are most cordial in their appreciation of these generous gifts from Christian America, which are reaching them at the time when most needed. May God richly bless the work and the workers to his own glory and the saving of many precious lives.

As to Sunday School Lessons

SUNDAY Schools have not done all that could be desired either in the impartation of Bible knowledge or the development of Christian character. Seeking for a remedy, a considerable number of Sunday School leaders are displacing the uniform lesson system by a new series which presents a different lesson for each "grade." This break from uniformity to a uniform variety is not going to stop there, for the Presbyterian Educational Superintendent of Sunday Schools, Rev. E. Morris Fergusson, said in the Westminster Teacher for January:

> The alternative, also, is always open to the intelligent leader of rejecting all these ready-made propositions, drafting a line of studies for himself. A large majority of the Sunday Schools still hold to the uniform lesson system, but an aggressive propaganda against it threatens us with the condition that preceded the uniform system, when every teacher did what was right in his own eyes.

Now, as THE CHRISTIAN HERALD teaches at the present time, under Dr. and Mrs. Crafts, what is doubtless the largest Sunday School class in the country, if not in the world, it can speak with experience on this subject. There are some advantages in the system, and also in the selection of special courses of lessons for particular schools or classes; but are there not more advantages peculiar to the uniform system, which would be lost by a change?

1. We should lose, with the uniform series, the weekly lesson helps in the religious and daily press, which could not spare room for more than one lesson.
2. We should probably lose the annual books on the lessons, which could not be made as well or sold as cheaply if the uniform lesson constituency were greatly reduced.
3. We should lose the weekly union teachers' meetings, where the best teacher gives the others the benefit of his skill, and one general teachers' class for lesson study in the individual schools would no longer be practicable.
4. We should lose the pastors' aid by review.
5. We should lose the continunity of lesson study.
6. We should lose co-operation between churches at home and in the mission field in the use of the same lesson material.
7. Most of all, we should lose the united home study of the lesson if the children had three lessons instead of one.

One of the leading advocates of the graded lessons, when the objection was raised that mothers could not be expected to teach several different lessons to their children, replied: "We are not planning lessons for mothers." Well, if not, why not? It seems to us that the real remedy for inadequate Bible knowledge and the few conversions among the children is in making more rather than less of the home. Parents who in their own childhood were called to the family altar, and on every Sunday sat in the family pew besides going to Sunday School, could not expect that the Sunday School alone, whatever the lesson system, can take the place of all that home religion for their children.

In holding to the uniform lessons, we need not lose the "grading," for the best Sunday Schools have had excellent grading under the uniform system, by adaptation of the one lesson to different grades. It has not always been easy to make this adaptation; but every lesson ever selected for the uniform series has been made by faithful teachers "profitable" to young and old.

The real remedy for the deficiency in religious knowledge and practice in the children is not a variety of lessons, but a revival of home religion; a large enlistment of pastors in work for the children, and a mid-week service for the children, who surely need it even more than the old saints; the promotion of a better Sabbath observance; better teaching and better teachers—the enlistment of the strong men as a Sunday School hedge to keep the boys.

The Reciprocity Message.

SELDOM has any Congress received so brief a Presidential message as that which President Taft sent in to the new Congress on April 5. It contained less than 600 words, and was wholly devoted to reciprocity. It urged the passage of the pact with Canada on the ground that it was the natural supplement of our friendly settlement of various diplomatic and political questions with that country; that it would promote commerce, strengthen friendly relations, open up Canada's reserve productive resources to our consumers and give us a broader outlet for our farm and industrial products. It pointed to the careful and discriminating labors of the Commission, and the popular approval of the agreement, and invited the earnest attention of both houses to the measure which the people of the two countries desire and by which both would be substantially benefited. Like all of Mr. Taft's messages, this latest one has the business-like merit of clear and straightforward statement. Short as it is, it covers the ground and leaves nothing to be said.

The Waste of Men in War

ONE of the significant signs of the times is that the civilized nations are gradually coming to realize the truth of the saying, frequently emphasized in these pages, that probably the worst use to which a human being could be put is to make him "food for powder." Baron de Constant, the distinguished Frenchman who is now making a tour of this country in the interest of international peace, has compiled some very instructive statistics on this aspect of the question. He openly charges that governments conceal from the people's knowledge the terrible consequences of war in the criminal sacrifice of human life. France's Napoleonic wars cost her from two to five million men and left her physically depleted for many years. Russia's wars, as well as those of England, Germany, Austria, Italy and our own nation, all were frightfully wasteful in human lives. If the battlefields of modern and even recent history were balanced in the scale against the results, it would be shown that every so-called victory made the whole world poorer and none more so than the victorious power. The Baron could do no better service to the peace cause than to publish all the facts he has evidently gleaned on the needless sacrifice of men in warfare. Such a book would take rank with Bloch's famous volume on the Cost of War, which inspired the Czar to call the first Peace Congress.

Crime and the Saloon

IT IS encouraging to find the churches taking the open field in the fight against the saloon. At the recent Methodist Conference in New York, a resolution was adopted protesting against the lax enforcement of the excise laws, especially during the prohibited hours on Sunday. In the resolution the saloon is denounced as "the parent of crime." It was a strong yet truthful characterization which Dr. Ferdinand C. Iglehart put in the resolution, and it might have gone even further, for the saloon with the traffic it represents is the fruitful source of a multitude of evils. It is the oppressor of the poor, the blighter of character, the prolific cause of idleness, poverty and pauperism, the spoiler of men's brains and bodies and one of the very worst enemies of their souls. It robs them of health and happiness here and of heaven hereafter, for no drunkard shall inherit eternal life. Yet all the votaries of all other vices put together do not equal the great army of the slaves of drink. Tamerlane asked for a hundred and sixty thousand human skulls to build a pyramid to his honor as a conqueror. He got the skulls and built the pyramid. But if the skulls of those poor creatures who have fallen victims to drink, mainly through the American saloon, in a single decade, were to be piled up, they would make a pyramid that would dwarf that reared by the monster Tamerlane. And it is a pyramid that is growing bigger every year—a ghastly pile of victims that shames our civilization. But the time must come, God willing, when the saloon with its accompaniments of crime, misery and despair will be a thing of the past. To hasten that time and to remove this blot from our country's fair fame should be the earnest desire and prayer of every good citizen. May it come soon!

A Sad Tribute

IN MOURNFUL procession, over fifty thousand workers marched through the streets of New York on April 5 and paid silent tribute to the memory of the victims of the recent factory fire in which 145 operatives lost their lives. Half a million hushed spectators lined the sidewalks. All the great factories of the city were shut. To the faint notes of muffled music the procession marched with white, sorrowful faces, through the falling rain, behind draped banners that proclaimed their loss. These banners, however, bore no words of animosity or recrimination. The demonstration was a tribute to the dead, not an excoriation of the living. Yet, though silent, it was an eloquent protest against the shamefully inadequate protection of human life in workshops and factories and a strong though unuttered rebuke to the authorities whose criminal indifference made such tragedies possible. This voiceless plea by the sons and daughters of toil carried their case to the tribunal of public conscience It will have a greater influence than a thousand speeches at crowded mass meetings. It deserves to be heeded.

General Notes

—THE PRODUCTION of cotton is on the increase in the Southern States, the crop of 1910 giving 1,500,000 more bales than that of the previous year. The total number of bales on the market last year was 11,941,563.

—THE CUBAN CONGRESS reconvened early in April and received the Presidential message, in which President Gomez announced the continuance of peace and order throughout the republic. During the last two years the Cuban public debt has been reduced $3,465,000, and there has been unprecedented activity in the construction of railroads, highways, and public buildings. The sugar crop has been large in spite of the lack of rain, and the sanitary conditions in the island are excellent.

—AT THE OPENING of the Mexican Congress on April 1 President Diaz accomplished the second important act in his reform programme by promulgating the outlines of the measures which he has decided are necessary in order to comply with the outcry for administrative regeneration in the federal and State governments. He declared unqualifiedly for the enaction of anti-re-election legislation to provide for rotation in office of the President, Cabinet members and State governors; for remedying defects complained of in local administrations of States and municipalities; for amendment of the election laws so as to insure actual freedom of the franchise and the barring from the polls of illiterate voters, and for the reform of the federal judiciary. He also pledged himself to bring about the division of the large rural estates on terms of equity to the owners and to those who desire to purchase small parcels of these lands and place them under cultivation.

Speaker Clark Inaugurated

THE first session of the Sixty-second Congress, called by President Taft to act upon the Canadian Reciprocity Agreement, was held in Washington, April 4. It had been sixteen years since the Democrats had controlled the House, and they perfected their organization with unusually enthusiastic demonstration. Representative Champ Clark of Missouri was elected to the speakership, receiving 217 votes to 131 cast for James R. Mann of Illinois, the nominee of the Republican caucus. Messrs. Mann and Underwood of Alabama and Vreeland of New York were appointed a committee to wait upon Speaker Clark in one of the little rooms in the building to inform him of what had taken place and escort him to the chair. As they did so the Democrats arose, each man waving a small American flag and cheering right lustily. Mr. Mann, waiting till the applause had ceased, made this brief introduction: "The speakership is a great office and filled by a great man. Gentlemen, I present to you your Speaker, the Hon. Champ Clark of Missouri." The Speaker took the new gavel with its silver plate, which an admirer had sent him, rapped and secured order, and made his inaugural address, outlining the policies and purposes of the Democrats. At the conclusion of the address he asked Representative Talbot of Maryland, who is the oldest Democrat in point of service, to administer the oath to him. Everybody rose as the Maryland veteran read the oath, which Mr. Clark took. It is expected by political friends and foes alike that Speaker Clark will make what he promises—an intelligent, just, tactful, kind and successful presiding officer. Speaker Clark, it is generally understood, owes his election to the intimate personal friendship between William Jennings Bryan and himself, and Mr. Bryan's active efforts in his behalf. Like Harmon of Ohio, Wilson of New Jersey, and others, his name is used in connection with the possible nomination for a still higher office than he now holds. The injunction given to the political leaders of old for their guidance in the government of God's chosen people will no doubt be followed by Speaker Clark throughout his term of office.

Love in Animals

There was a cat belonging to Mrs. Stanislaus Fradansky of Bayonne, N. J., which had a family of kittens. The owner did not care for the little things a week old, and sent word to the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals to come and take them away. When Charles B. Lambert, the officer of the society, took the kittens, the mother cat flew at him and scratched him severely. As the owner of the cat was leaning out of the third-story window watching the officer take away his freight, the old cat jumped up on the window sill, and as the wagon door closed on her children she gave a loud wail and leaped to the ground and her death. There is no one who has a pet cat or dog or other creature that is not often impressed with the true love which these animals have for their offspring and master or mistress. The affection is often pathetic. What a beautiful illustration the cat gave of the maternal instinct which is so marked in almost all animals, and which is so pathetic and so nearly divine in the human heart. Mother's love is pictured in one of the early Bible tragedies.

In Rama was there a voice heard, lamentation, and weeping, and great mourning, Rachel weeping for her children, and would not be comforted, because they are not. (Matt. 2: 18.)

Cattle Food for People

Mr. Mark C. Rich of Hot Springs, S. D., claims that alfalfa is as good food for people as it is for horses, cattle, and sheep. On returning from the Dry Farming Congress in Pierre he made an after-dinner speech at a banquet given by the local commercial club, in which he gave his experience in his test of the value of alfalfa as a human food. In the experiment he made tea of carefully selected leaves and drank of the brew as he would coffee or tea. He says the addition of this alfalfa extract to his bill of fare caused a gain of ten and a half pounds in two weeks. He then tried it on his baby, who was so tiny that they nicknamed her "Midget," and claims she showed a decided gain by the use of the new diet. This new article of food will be hailed with gratitude by all classes, especially the poor, and will contribute materially to the solution of the problem of the high cost of living. The Bible makes record of a man who ate grass, but he did not do so from choice, but as a judgment visited upon him.

The same hour was the thing fulfilled upon Nebuchadnezzar; and he was driven from men, and did eat grass as oxen, and his body was wet with the dew of heaven, till his hairs were grown like eagles' feathers, and his nails like birds' claws. (Dan. 4:33.)

Fortune for Indians

Judge E. P. Hill is back from Hugo, Okla., where he accompanied F. E. Abbott, Acting Commissioner of Indian Affairs. They had been to look over the great timber reserve of the Indians. The forest reserve embraces about 1,500,000 acres of timber lands in four counties of Oklahoma. The principal trees are pine, with considerable quantities of white oak and some cypress. It is understood that the Indians are to receive $10,000,000 in cash for their land. The policy of injustice toward the red man almost from the very start in this country has been one of the most disgraceful chapters in American history. Fortunately there is a much better disposition in these times to do justice toward the Indian, and even to atone for some of the injustices of the past. It would have been well if in our dealing with the original owners of the soil and forests of our country we had obeyed the injunction:

Thou shalt not defraud thy neighbor, neither rob him. (Lev. 19:13.)

American-Japanese Treaty

Ratifications of the American-Japanese commercial treaty were exchanged recently at the palace of the Mikado for the American Ambassador, Mr. O'Brien. Marquis Katsura, the premier, and Count Komura, the foreign minister, were present at the luncheon. After the luncheon the Emperor handed to Mr. O'Brien an English translation of his formal message to President Taft, which was as follows: "Attaching the highest importance to the perpetuation of the relations of friendship and good understanding which have so long united our two countries, and believing that the treaty just ratified will serve to strengthen and render still more enduring these relations, and knowing the important part you took in bringing about the fortunate results, I desire to express to you the sense of my high appreciation of your successful efforts and an assurance of my continued friendship." In answer President Taft sent this cablegram: "I beg to assure your Majesty of my deep appreciation for the friendly message sent through the American Ambassador on the occasion of the consummation of the new treaty between our respective countries. I am happy to join with your Majesty in the confident expectation that the treaty will result in binding still closer the ties that have so long united the peoples of the United States and Japan in amity and peace. I also beg to assure your Majesty of my hearty reciprocation of the sentiments of cordial friendship."

While the jingoes are making war between Japan and America with their mouths, the heads of the two nations are giving to each other the hand of friendship and mutual helpfulness. There was a commercial treaty between Solomon and Hiram, King of Tyre.

And there was peace between Hiram and Solomon; and they two made a league together. (I. Kings 5:12.)

50,000 in Funeral Procession

One of the most pathetic scenes ever witnessed in New York City was the labor parade on April 5 in memory of the victims of the Triangle Shirtwaist Factory fire. At every meeting room of a labor union in the city, members gathered, and tramped through the drizzling rain and over the slippery streets to express their grief at the removal of 145 of their fellow wage-earners. These fifty thousand waist-makers and garment-workers of every department wore black robes. There was no fife nor drum nor band of music. There was silence, broken only by the sound of the footfall of the mourners. At the close of the parade the funerals of seven unidentified were held, and their bodies laid to sleep in the city plot of the Evergreen Cemetery, various kinds of religious services being held at the graves. The parade was not only one of mourning, but was also designed to be one of sullen anger at the criminal negligence on all sides that made the fearful massacre possible. These scores of thousands took this most eloquent way of expressing their hatred of the insufficient means of escape, the absence of fire extinguishing devices, the barring of doors, the choking of means of egress. They took this method also of calling to the public to see to it that the Fire Department and Building Department of the city give some immediate guarantee that the hundreds of thousands of precious lives that are engaged in the various trades shall not be wickedly sacrificed. The city of 5,000,000 population, Protestant, Catholic and Hebrew, are in hearty sympathy with the sorrow of these people, and with their just hatred of that needless sacrifice. This demonstration reminds us of the description given of death and the sorrow which it brings:

Man goeth to his long home, and the mourners go about the streets. (Eccles. 12:5.)

A Canvas That May Help to Promote Universal Peace

From the Painting by Edgar Bundy, R. I.

From the Illustrated London News

"THE SWORDS OF SOLDIERS ARE HIS TEETH": THE ONLY VICTOR IN THE WARS OF THE WORLD

Now that the question of the possibilities and probabilities of universal peace is once more uppermost in the minds of men, it seems to us particularly appropriate to publish this very striking picture by Mr. Edgar Bundy, which is designed to show Death, "THE GREATEST GENERAL OF ALL," riding beneath his pale flag, the only victor in the wars of the world, his dead jaws lined with steel, the swords of soldiers his teeth. It is not a pretty picture; but war is not beautiful. So we have no hesitation in reproducing it, that it may do something towards promoting international arbitration.

$20,000 More for Starving China

The Christian Herald Relief Fund Has Now Passed the $100,000 Mark and is Saving Many Lives

ANOTHER remittance of $20,000 has this week been sent to the Famine Relief Missionary Committee at Chin-kiang, China, from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Relief Fund. This latest sum, like all our former remittances since the famine began, was cabled through the State Department in Washington. The remittances forwarded from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to date, including the $21,000 worth of flour represented in the cargo of the Buford, have now reached the grand total of $102,100.

Letters received during the week from the famine field show that up to the present time there has been no diminution in the distress. The Rev. E. C. Lobenstine of Hwai-Yuan writes of date March 14: "The impression seems to have got out that the present famine is less severe than that of three years ago. I think the others who like myself are engaged in famine relief work, will bear me out in the statement that not only is the present famine fully as severe as that of three years ago, but also that it is extended over a far greater area. I myself have seen only the afflicted parts of the province of Anhui, but speaking for them, I can say that there is absolutely no comparison between the need that exists now and that of the former famine.

Hoping for Food by the Generosity of America

"Saddest of all has been the sale of women and children. Even in China, it is generally considered disgraceful for a man to sell his wife, and the sale cannot take place openly. This year not only does the sale take place quite openly, but the purchaser is even regarded as a benevolent man, no matter how nefarious his object in the purchase may be. Those most in demand are girls from the ages of twelve to sixteen; most of these are bought as slaves for lives of degradation. One is constantly seeing children offered for sale on the streets. A child under ten can be bought for anywhere from a dime to a quarter, and of course many are given away, if the parents can find some one who will promise to support them.

"It is a constant surprise to see the fortitude of the people in the face of death. It is true that there has been much robbery and theft throughout the famine district, and that the country has been kept from breaking loose in rebellion only by the strong hand of the law. In one city alone the official has either decapitated or hung in wooden cages over three hundred people since last fall, and the number is not much less in other cities; still, in view of the fact of the awful suffering of the people, and of the additional fact that even the theft of a few loaves of bread is sufficient to cause a man to be hung, it is a constant miracle that the country is as peaceful as it is." Mr. Lobenstine adds that up to the present time the relief afforded to over 300,000 persons in four large districts during the last two and a half months has amounted to only a fraction of a cent a day per head. Imperfect as has been the relief work, it has undoubtedly resulted in a large saving of life. They have kept alive somehow.

Rev. Samuel Cochran, of the American Presbyterian Mission, writes: "We are giving out 1,800 Nanking piculs of rice this week to 40,000 people, many of whom are so far gone that they can hardly walk. We have means to repeat this in twenty days; but following that we have no provision unless we get more from the Relief Committee. Hundreds are doubtless dying daily in this hsien. I hear one estimate of 2,000 dying by starvation in the last few days in the fifteen wards in which we are distributing relief."

Rev. James B. Webster, Treasurer of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Committee at Chin-kiang, writes: "I am sending you a photograph of the refugees in the Chin-kiang province—there were about 30,000 of them. The officials have sent them back to their homes in the famine district, and judging from the reports from those sections, it means that they go back to starve. Many must perish by the way."

Missionary Wade D. Bostick writes from Pochow: "The death roll appalling. People are using their furniture for fuel. Whenever a missionary goes out of doors he is surrounded by hundreds of ghastly, emaciated men appealing for work or help. One family of five—father, mother and three children—were found dead at the entrance to a temple, the parents having strangled the children and then hung themselves rather than face death by slow starvation. In a single county there are 300,000 foodless. Many have the bloated, swollen eyes which have come to be recognized as the forerunner of collapse from starvation." Mr. Bostick adds:

There came several men to my door telling me that they had "refugeed," hoping to find work or to beg their food. Not doing either they had returned, feeling that if they must perish they would rather do so at their old home. They applied to me for work at three cents a day, and when I told them that I could take on no more, they begged that I give them something to get bread. Later, there came an old man and his son, who got on their knees saying that they were nearly perished and would not go till they had gotten something. Their faces and eyes were too conclusive proof that they were near death's door from sheer hunger. Then I went to where the work is going on and several others prayed me to take them on, took hold of my clothes, saying they would not let go them till I promised them work. As I turned to go to the street I saw two men carrying a helpless man on a pole. He had become so weak from hunger that he had fallen in the deep mud of the street, and could not even crawl out. When these two Samaritans placed him on higher ground, he attempted to get on his knees and hands, but toppled over even from his knees, as weak as a child.

Many have perished on the streets; but one of the saddest cases I have heard of was that of a man who died last week, right near us. He was so overcome with hunger that in the last moments he picked up clods of dirt and crammed them into his mouth!

Almost every conceivable thing that can be sold is disposed of for food. On the streets are benches, chairs, tables, beds, lamps, and cooking utensils offered at less than the fourth of an ordinary price. There are also the outfits of carpenters and masons and other workers, offered at almost any price. One man offering to sell me the bench used daily in his house, said that he was not able to keep anything now. Then from the farm there are the hoe, mattock, plow, harrow, reaping-hook, and other implements. As one goes into the country, it is so noticeable that no stock of any kind is to be seen. It will take a long hard battle for these poor people to recover from the loss of this year.

Contributions to the fund continue to come in from many quarters. Many of the letters are full of interest. A short story, briefly told, is contained in this note from a lady in Atlanta, Texas:

"A woman invests $1.50 in a CHRISTIAN HERALD subscription. Papers received and read, and interest awakened in starving China. Suggestion made to teachers on March 5. 'In teaching how Elisha saved one life, contrast how easily a Chinese life can be saved now.' Also a short article in a Sunday School publication, March 12, on 'The Chinese Situation.' Pastor's interest awakened and a sermon on 'Starving China' is the result. Some further notices of a public donation being received in the daily press. The fund is growing and will be wired to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Tuesday, March 14, at noon. The sequel to the story will be the total amount subscribed. It is now in excess of $125, and the books will be open over twenty-four hours yet." Excellent work, and sure to be followed by good results.

Awaiting Relief for Themselves and Baby

A reader, Anna B., of Liberty, Mo., writes: "Here is a plan adopted by two members of the Second Baptist Church of Liberty, Mo.: Dr. J. E. Cook of William Jewell College, and Mr. W. F. Norton of the Citizens' Bank, each having a family of five, agreed to support a Chinese family of five through the famine. Dr. Cook made an appeal for every father to do likewise. I thought his example worthy to be passed on to all the heads of CHRISTIAN HERALD families. Awful as the famine is, a single State, doing its duty, could stop it."

IN THE HOME QUEEN'S REALM

Women in Council

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

OUR first letter this week is sent us by a correspondent whose words are worth pondering:

"The whole responsibility of juvenile training does not rest upon the mother. God gives the children to both parents, and will require as much of one as of the other when the day of reckoning comes. Daily men are turning the entire character-building of their little ones over to the mother, never once questioning whether she is strong enough mentally or physically, or whether she has the ability, to lay the firm foundation alone. Some of our men who have constructed some of the largest buildings, the longest bridges, greatest tunnels, founded colleges and schools, and built up great churches, have simply made a wreck of forming the character of their own children. They have let the frail mother, the colored nurse, or a tutor, perhaps, do this greatest of life's work, and the most important in the sight of God and man.

"How often I have longed to tell you in the eighteen years of my married life how I have enjoyed your messages of love and comfort! Often when I have been miles from friends and loved ones, in railroad camp, with my husband and babies, your messages have come, always comforting and bringing rays of sunshine.

Not in the Future Tense

"I READ in a recent number of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD what you said by way of comfort to one in sorrow: 'God will help you.' I had a bit of experience on that line, some years ago, as an invalid. I kept saying, 'God will help me,' but he did not. One day it came to me that I was putting off the very thing I wished for; so I stopped, and ever afterward said, 'God is healing me,' and the work was done. Would it not be well for Christians to say 'now' and not 'by and by' when they are asking for anything they need? J. M. M."

Our friend has evidently taken to heart the words of our Lord, "Your Father knoweth what things ye have need of before ye ask him."

Can You Help This Mother

"I HAVE a little son who is a problem, though he is only three years old. I have been a teacher in the public school, and I was considered a good disciplinarian. I have never believed in letting a child be the master, and am willing to resort to any right method to control him; but my boy is not easily governed. I have tried to love him into things, but have given that up, believing that severity is necessary. One day, when I had been very patient and loving, and he had been exceptionally naughty, a few tears trickled down my cheeks, something he had never before seen on my face. He simply said, 'Are you crying a little, mother? Well, I'd like to see you cry real hard.' He is persistent and determined as well as contrary. I have punished him a dozen times for the same offense, and then realized to my chagrin and sorrow that he was still unconquered. This morning I had him eat alone in the kitchen because he talked in an ugly manner to his grandma, at whose house we are visiting. It was not the first time he had been obliged to eat alone, and he did not seem to mind it in the least, although he was at first inclined to rebel. He is very honest, and tells me all of his misdeeds—indeed, rather glories in them; for so soon as other members of the household arrive he informs them that he has been naughty. Sometimes a stranger asks him how he feels, and he replies: 'Oh, not very well. I'm kind of naughty this morning,' when perhaps I have forgotten his naughtiness. He is extremely sympathetic and good during any one's illness, but resumes his old attitude as soon as the patient is better. At times, too, he is very affectionate, and right here is a characteristic I cannot understand, for I cannot work on the child's feelings, and he does not grieve if any loved ones go away, not even myself, though he is more attached to me than to anybody. The birch is no stranger in the house. M. C. F."

QUEEN MARY'S GIFT

QUEEN MARY of England has a motherly heart, and its loving care is extended beyond the circle of her own fireside. On Christmas a little protegee of hers, Rosie Bloxham, received from Her Majesty the gift of a tea-set. In the picture Rosie is seen on the extreme right pouring tea for the first time for her little friends.

Mrs. Lucretia Mott, a venerable member of the Society of Friends, was once paying a friendly visit in a home where a small child was as great a puzzle to his mother as this dear little boy of three seems to be to his. Every morning at breakfast the child suddenly seized his cup of milk and dashed it to the floor, with results that may be imagined. Remonstrance and punishment failed to deter the wee boy from the act of destruction, day by day. "Thee does not understand the child," said the old Quakeress to the young mother. "Thee does not comprehend that he is of a dramatic temperament and wants to make a sensation. Cover the floor around the table with something that cannot be hurt, or take up the rug and leave the floor bare. Put the milk in a tin cup, and when the little fellow performs his theatrical act, let nobody pay the least attention. Go on as if nothing had happened. Thee will find that he will not do this more than twice, if thee lets it pass without taking notice." The plan worked to a charm. Young mothers are apt to put a great deal of emphasis on discipline, and the first child comes in for a large share of it. However, I will leave the question for discussion in the hands of experienced mothers.

A Perversion of Justice

THE story comes to us through the Cincinnati Post that a boy of fourteen has been sentenced to life imprisonment in Minnesota for the crime of fatally shooting a policeman. If this is true, the people of Minnesota should at once take steps to have this sentence modified. No boy of fourteen should be sacrificed to so cruel a perversion of justice as this. The boy may or may not have deliberately killed the policeman, but whatever his motive, whether the crime was murder in the real sense of the word, or simply was accidental homicide, he can be put to better use than to be shut up for life behind the bars of a prison. The boy may have carried a gun in mere bravado. He may have been reading dime novels. Whatever be the cause behind his act, he is young enough to be redeemed to clean manhood. The late Rev. Dr. Amory H. Bradford, once commenting in public on a harsh sentence imposed in New York State upon several youthful train-wreckers, said with an emphasis which none who heard it could ever forget, "Every one of us sitting here is a sharer in the crime of these boys. So long as society suffers bad reading and low amusements to pervert the minds of boys, so long as no provision is made to save the boys of the street from debasing ideals, just so long God will hold us responsible for such perversions of justice as we find in sentences like these."

The Never-Ending Servant Question

IN NEWARK, N. J., a cooking and training school for domestic servants is about to be started in the form of a co-operative club. Housekeepers joining the club will pay annual dues of five dollars each, the latter paying two dollars when they secure a place with which they are satisfied. Women looking for work, if members of the club, may live there while out of a position, presumably paying for board and lodging at a reasonable rate. An effort will be made to reduce the difficulties that seem to bristle whenever the subject of domestic service is named, by bringing business principles to bear upon the entire situation. Housekeepers will await with some curiosity and no little sympathy the development of the co-operative idea in the Newark club. Meanwhile, in most households, a good and considerate mistress, who understands housekeeping, and who is willing to make a friend of the woman in her kitchen, may go on without too much discouragement in her work of home-making.

Endowing Rural Pulpits

I HAVE just read that a great educational institution has received an endowment of $20,000,000. The income of this sum will benefit directly about one thousand people each year. Its indirect benefit is, of course, beyond our calculation. It suggests the thought, however, that perhaps if the attention of some of the great philanthropists were called to it some might see their way to benefit their fellows by the endowment of rural pulpits. Take the sum mentioned as an example. This would give $10,000 each to two hundred churches; would, at six per cent., give in each case $600 as the nucleus of a pastor's salary; would insure weekly or biweekly services in a great number of communities and the preaching of the Gospel to twenty thousand people, few of whom can ever receive academic or collegiate training and fewer still a university course.

OUR BOYS AND GIRLS

THE COZY CORNER

ONWARD, CHRISTIAN SOLDIERS

Onward, Christian soldiers,
Marching as to war,
With the cross of Jesus
Going on before!
Christ, the royal Master,
Leads against the foe!
Forward, into battle,
See his banners go!

Like a mighty army
Moves the Church of God;
Brothers, we are treading
Where the saints have trod;
We are not divided,
All one body we;
One in hope and doctrine,
One in charity.

Hats Off to "Old Glory"! Long May She Wave!

EVERY boy and girl in America should own "Old Glory." If you have not an "Old Glory" of your own, take my advice and get one.

You should have "Old Glory" in your room near by you all the time.

First. Because "Old Glory" with its brave red stripes and white, standing for valor and purity, its blue field that stands for justice, and its galaxy of shining stars representing the history of the greatest of all nations—"a star for every State and a State for every star"—is the most beautiful national banner in the world.

Second. Every American boy and girl should own "Old Glory" because to live along with it nearby, like an intimate friend in your room, makes for the feelings of patriotism, loyalty, brotherhood, heroism, and most of the sturdy characteristics that go into the making of best American boys and girls.

Third. Each and every boy and girl should really own "Old Glory" because, when the nation celebrates its anniversaries, every true-hearted young American should set his seal of approval by loyally flying his and her own Star-Spangled Banner.

Actual Size of "Old Glory" is 6x4 Feet

Our National Holidays

ON Decoration Day, when the country sets work aside and celebrates the memory of the brave soldier boys, North, South, East and West, who gave their lives to make of our nation what it is to-day;

On the Fourth of July, our own glorious Independence Day;

On Arbor Day, when already upwards of a thousand million trees have been planted out by boys and girls in the United States since the famous day was instituted by John Stanley Morton in 1872;

On Labor Day; on Washington's, Lincoln's, and Columbus' Birthdays; on special hero days; on Peace Sunday: on all flag-raising occasions and national gala times throughout the year, every boy and girl should feel it his and her duty to take active part and to set an "Old Glory" of his and her own

Flying in the Golden Sunshine

NOTHING so keenly kindles the spark of loyalty, the love of life and heroism like the sight of your own "Old Glory" flying bravely in the golden sunshine against the blue sky, or waving from the home window, a precious symbol, a mighty evidence of your own high-heartedness and pride of country.

Yes, there is no doubt about it, my young friends. Believe me when I say it: Every true American boy and girl should have, must have, "Old Glory."

Old Glories Enough for All

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD feels so strongly in this movement and is so heart and soul with it that the president has gotten for us "Old Glories" enough for all.

Such Splendid Banners!

SUCH splendid banners! I am proud indeed to send them out among you all. They are six feet long and four feet broad, with great wide stripes, a deep blue field, and brave white stars.

They are uncommonly beautiful. They were made for us by the flag-maker who supplies the United States Government, and every one is guaranteed. You can depend upon it, they are all that I say they are, and more besides.

Hats off, boys, to "Old Glory"! Girls, wave your handkerchiefs! Salute the splendid old banner!

Own Old Glory

EVERY CHRISTIAN HERALD boy and girl who agrees with us in this splendid sentiment shall own a sturdy "Old Glory."

When CHRISTIAN HERALD boys and girls really want anything worth while we intend to give it to them. We can think of nothing more gloriously inspiring as a first step to good fellowship with the world, with your country, with your comrades, with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, with us: than to own a big wide-striped "Old Glory" and to pledge yourself to fly it in some conspicuous place, or from your own home windows at every holiday, national celebration or local flag-flying time when it is appropriate that the American flag should fly.

Come, Boys and Girls, and Be Up and at It

IN THE words of the splendid old Declaration of Independence: All men are created equal—in this great country. No symbol tells this brave story like "Old Glory."

Never in all your life will you have such an opportunity again.

A Glorious Opportunity

MAKE just one new friend for the great CHRISTIAN HERALD, and you have won your own Star-Spangled Banner.

Tell your friend that, for allowing the splendid CHRISTIAN HERALD to come into his or her home from now until January, 1912, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD with its innumerable good things for every member of the family; interesting stories and verses, suggestions for church fairs and entertainments, school and home festivals, and other happy surprises too many to mention here, and one single dollar, you can all claim one of these splendid "Old Glories" that I have described here for your very own.

Once more, Hats Off, Boys, to "Old Glory"! Girls, salute the splendid old emblem, with its matchless motto—"In God is our trust."

Go forth and earn "Old Glory" to run up into the sunshine and bravely fly against the sky whenever the opportunity comes. It will say for you "I love my country." On all the glad and glorious patriotic days throughout the year it will sing for you

My country, 'tis of thee,
Sweet land of liberty;
Thy name I love.

Explain to your friend how easy it is to get a superbly beautiful "Old Glory" that will last you all your life.

Almost any one will stand by you on such a generous proposition as this. Do not delay—make up your mind to live with "Old Glory" near by you all the time. Send right away while our supply is fresh and beautiful.

Patriotic "Christian Herald" Boys and Girls

YOU see, we are all soldiers after all. Some of us are pluckier and more like the real soldiers who have gone out to defend their country's flag than others. But we are all soldiers in our love and loyalty. And remember this, all you young people who will be reading the Cozy Corner this week: You are the Peace soldier boys and girls of to-morrow. The whole country is looking to you to raise and maintain the honor of our country—the honor of "Old Glory."

Let us be the most patriotic, wide-awake, energetic set of young Americans in the country.

As Beautiful as a Flower

THE great beauty of the American flag is very generally recognized by other nations. When it was first carried by an American ship into Japanese waters, the Japanese thought it was as beautiful as a flower. Hundreds and thousands hurried to see Kaw-Kee-Cheum or the Flower-Flag ship. America is still called Kaw-Kee-Kah, the Flower-Flag country, and in poetical Japanese Americans are known as Kaw-Kee-Koch-Yin, men of the Flower-Flag country.

Our Good-Night Verse

Our father's God, to thee,
Author of liberty,
To thee we sing:
Long may our land be bright
With freedom's holy light;
Protect us by thy might,
Great God, our King!

Lovingly and faithfully,
The Aunt in

Portugal's Poet President

THEOPHILO BRAGA, President of the Portuguese Republic, is a self-made man from the bottom up. From an early age he had to carve his own way, and that he has made an emphatic mark in the political and social world of his time is evidenced by the commanding position he now holds in the new government. Pre-eminently he is a man of the people, one who has worked for the people and their best interests from the time he was able to take an active part in public affairs. He thoroughly understands the democracy and their wants because he himself was taught in the school of a hard experience, and knows every step of the curriculum as thoroughly as the most horny-handed son of toil, who has to earn his bread in the sweat of his face. He was born in the island of Sao Miguel, the largest of the Azores, in 1843, where his father, an artillery officer who had espoused the "lost cause" of Dom Miguel, the Pretender, had to seek a livelihood when opportunity shut its doors against him in his native land. The elder Braga became a mathematical teacher in the Lyceum of Ponta Delgada, but as his salary was small, the children at an early age had to make effort to contribute to the family exchequer. Theophilo turned to the typesetting business, and while attending to his duties in this rather irksome calling for a boy, he contrived to find time for study. At the age of eighteen he left his island home, and entered the University of Coimbra in Portugal. He had a hard struggle to secure an education, and many a day had to go hungry because he had not the wherewithal to buy bread. He managed to exist in a kind of way by teaching and other kinds of literary work. He was inclined towards history and poetry. In the former field he delved into the great events of the past, while in the latter he studied the contemporary writings of the leading men of his time. It was a period of inspiration. Such great minds as Hugo, Musset, Michelet, Proudhon, Hegel and Kant were dominating the thought of Europe. Young Braga took copious draughts from the teachings of all these masters. In a short time he essayed to strike out for himself, and produced some poems very remarkable for a boy of his age, one of them, "A Vision of the Times," creating quite a sensation among the thinking public of Portugal.

In 1867 he graduated in law, and the next year took the doctor's degree with high honors. From this time onwards his pen was actively engaged in turning out many works, which have a permanent place not alone in his own country but throughout Europe. Among these are History of Portuguese Law, History of Portuguese Literature, etc. In 1871 he was called to the chair of Modern Literature in the Superior Course of Letters in Lisbon. It was shortly after this that the whole course of his life and writings became changed by the perusal of a book which has wielded a powerful influence on the best thought of Europe for generations. This was Comte's Outline of Positive Philosophy. It worked a complete mental revolution in Braga. It caused him immediately to rearrange his ideas, and make up for what he considered his deficiencies in his ideas of the abstract and natural sciences. He studied Comte to such purpose that in 1879 he produced his own Outline of Positive Philosophy, based very closely on the theories and ideas of the great French philosopher. This work was immediately followed by Universal History, a monumental work dealing with applied sociology. His System of Sociology came out in 1884. These books of Braga's spread Positivism throughout Portugal, and proved the foundation on which he erected the edifice of party leadership. Indeed it was quite natural for Braga to become the leader of a Republican Party, for a republic was his life-long dream. In 1881 he published a work called Dissolution of the Constitutional Monarchical System, in which he pointed out the anachronisms of monarchy and the Roman hierarchy, two elements which he considered the greatest foes of modern society and modern progress.

Theophilo Braga

Despite his incessant literary labors—he has written upwards of 150 books—he has never been a passive intellectualist, but always an active militant leader, ready to make any sacrifice for what he considers right and for the best interests of the common people. But although he is militant and aggressive, he never thrusts himself forward, but waits in the background till occasion calls. He made it possible for a republic to be proclaimed which promises to place the country once more on the plane of prosperous nationhood.

Braga may have his own systems of philosophy, his own ideas regarding the cosmos of society, his own theories of the ethics of living, but it is certain that none who know the situation can deny that he has done much for Portugal in the way of reform, that he has kept every pledge he made and that he is doing his very best to raise the status of the country and at the same time give a fair and square deal to all.

NEW YORK'S NEW U. S. SENATOR

AFTER one of the longest and most acrimonious deadlocks in the political history of the State of New York, Justice James A. O'Gorman was elected to succeed ex-Senator Chauncey M. Depew by the State Legislature at Albany on March 31. Senator O'Gorman is a New Yorker and his beginning was such as might have discouraged a man of less stamina, for he is a type of the self-made man. He was born May 5, 1860, in West Forty-third Street, New York, and was educated at the public schools. Upon finishing his public school course, he worked as a clerk in a law office. He learned stenography, and while still a youth entered the law department of the New York University. After graduation he set up the practice of law, and acquired a considerable fortune. While still a young man he was elected a Municipal Court Justice in what is now the Third district and served six years in that branch of the judiciary. In 1899, when he was but thirty-nine years of age, he was elected to the Supreme Court. It has been said that "Whatever advantage the State of New York may gain from the presence of Justice James A. O'Gorman in the United States Senate will be to the loss of the Supreme Court bench of the county of New York and many members of the bar. Practically all the lawyers who practise in the Supreme Court regret his exchange of the judicial gown for the senatorial toga, for he was regarded as one of the ablest justices, although he has been less known to the public than many of his colleagues; for once having abandoned the active side of politics, he devoted nearly all of his time to his office and his family." He has six daughters and one son. One of the daughters is Mrs. Dudley Field Malone, wife of an Assistant Corporation Counsel, and another daughter is the wife of William L. J. Duffy, a contractor. Nearly every year it has been the custom of Senator O'Gorman to go to Europe with his wife and children, and it made a large family party.

MISS ANN

By ELEANOR H. PORTER

Author of "The Transformation of Margaret," "Into Still Waters," "Marco," etc.

WHEN the plan was first suggested, Miss Ann had embraced it enthusiastically.

"We've got to have money," the president of the Ladies' Aid Society had said, "or else we can't give our promised fifty dollars toward the new carpet for the church. It has been suggested that we get up an autograph quilt—a quilt made of white squares, you know, all covered with names, and worked in red. You get ten cents a name—and of course they're glad to pay it. What's ten cents compared to havin' your name handed down like that to posterity?"

"And they got fifty-six dollars at Queechy, just for the name, besides sellin' it," chimed in the vice-president, by way of emphasis.

"Oh, splendid!" chorused a dozen voices, while Miss Ann breathed rapturously: "Fifty-six dollars! My!"

It was a simple matter after that. The cloth was ordered to be bought, and to be cut by Miss Ann into squares, these to be distributed as soon as possible. Each member present agreed to take one or more, and Miss Ann was appointed receiver of the finished squares. In addition she was to take two squares herself to fill.

All Flecherville awoke to a new experience during the days that followed. Everywhere were to be met insistent women with neat white squares of cotton cloth and a pencil. Everywhere, too, was to be seen the trail of bits of tambour-cotton; and always the trail led straight to Miss Ann's.

Miss Ann lived alone in a little cottage at the eastern end of the town. She was not old—the exact number of years was unknown; but at sixteen she had begun to wear only sombre gray and brown, and to smooth her hair into a tight coil at the back, particularly because her heart and hands and thoughts were full of an invalid mother and a younger brother. There was a time, it is true, when youth seemed for a moment to be hers. Miss Ann was eighteen then. The bun at the back of her head loosened its coils and freed the little curls at neck and brow. Bits of pink showed themselves at her throat, and matched the color of her cheeks when she went driving with Ned Hartley—a thing she did several times that summer. But Ned Hartley went away. Ned was poor, and had his own way to make in the world. He had made it, to be sure; he was said to be a famous surgeon now. But he had not been back to Flecherville once during all those years; so, after all, Flecherville knew little about him.

As to Miss Ann, the pink disappeared from her throat, and the curls from her brow. In time the invalid mother died, and the young brother went away, leaving Miss Ann all alone in the little house. And to this house now led the red trail of the tambour-cotton.

For three weeks Miss Ann worked valiantly to obtain her twenty-four names for her two squares. The first half-dozen names came easily; but after that——

The Wheelers and the Hart sisters had already been asked. Miss Jenkins refused with cold, but silent, disapproval. Mrs. Stone refused with equally cold, but open, disapproval. The next two Miss Ann asked accepted graciously, and the weary canvasser was beginning to regain her courage when she encountered the Dean twins. The Dean twins said yes, they would be very glad to put down their names, provided, of course, that Sarah Bailey's name was not to be on the quilt.

"But I—you—that is," floundered Miss Ann, ending desperately: "But, don't you see? There's to be fifty-six squares and twelve names to a square. Just as if I could help one of those six hundred and seventy-two names being Sarah Bailey's!"

"Very well; such being the case, I'm sure you won't miss ours," murmured Miss Amelia.

"No, indeed," echoed Miss Cordelia. And with that the Dean twins closed their door emphatically, leaving Miss Ann alone on the steps.

It was, perhaps, some compensation that almost the next woman Miss Ann asked, promised her dime and her autograph on the distinct condition that Sarah Bailey's name was on the quilt.

Judge Gray came next. Miss Ann thought she would try a man, chiefly because she believed a man could not care whether Sarah Bailey's or any other woman's name was or was not on the quilt. So sure of this was Miss Ann that she even mentioned it to the man himself, saying merrily, as she told him what she wanted:

"You see, Judge, I knew you wouldn't ask whether Sarah Bailey's name was or wasn't going to be down, before you gave me yours. I felt safe with you!"

Judge Gray, however, refused so peremptorily that, once outside his office, Miss Ann actually examined herself with care to make sure she was quite intact after her precipitate flight. She remembered then that it was Sarah Bailey who had declined to marry the Judge some years before, and that the Judge was supposed still to feel the wound. So it went. Day after day Miss Ann tramped the streets only to reach home at night tired, foot-sore, and discouraged.

It was February now, and for some days other finished squares had been coming in; and so, a little wearily, Miss Ann began her task of putting them together. She was beginning to think she did not like that quilt.

At the April meeting of the Ladies' Aid Society Miss Ann appeared with the finished quilt; and then the storm broke. The quilt was spread over the top of the piano where all might see it—and the members had begun to hunt for their own names. It was bedlam let loose.

Mrs. Lawson was displeased that her name was placed so near the edge where it would be always "tucked up out of sight." So, too, at once felt all the other "edgers." Yet nobody was satisfied. Those in the centre preferred the ends. Those on the ends preferred the sides. Nobody was on the square she would have chosen; nobody was content with her neighbors. Also, incredible as it seemed, the three Briggs sisters, who had been out of town when the quilt was proposed, had never been asked at all for their names. They stood aloof now, forlorn, hurt, and angry, though they scornfully assured their apologizing, gesticulating fellow-members that it was of no consequence, no consequence at all. Of course, if the ladies did not want their names on, it was fortunate, indeed, that they had been out of town.

Matters were made even worse just here by the discovery that S. Horatio Stubbs—a citizen of whom Flecherville was not proud—had scrawled his name on no less than forty of the fifty-six squares; and S. Horatio Stubbs was not a name that the Ladies' Aid would have elected to hand down to posterity. All of which did not tend to soothe Miss Ann, nor to make her love the quilt the more. She explained and apologized and "regretted" until she was flushed, hoarse, and almost ready to cry. Then supper brought new distractions, and a measure of peace.

It was decided at last that the quilt should be carried home by Mrs. Samuel Hartley for the summer (as it was now nearly May), and be brought out in the autumn to be sold. And with a long sigh Miss Ann went home. Her work was done.

Perhaps because her work was done, Miss Ann was restless that May. She began to spend the long days out of doors digging in the earth among her plants. She made friends, too, with the new family's little girls across the street, and she learned to romp—actually to romp!—with them beneath the pink-petaled apple trees. It was there and with them that she was one day, when the tall, smooth-shaven man with shoulders that drooped wearily stopped at her gate.

With a little cry Miss Ann struggled to her feet. Both hands flew to her hair. The children had unbound it, and decked it with apple blossoms. With the lovely pink in her cheeks, Miss Ann looked, indeed, quite like the Ann of long ago.

Over by the gate the tired shoulders straightened, and the eyes flashed into glad recognition.

"Ann!—Ann Wilcox! Don't you know me?" cried the man, striding forward.

"Yes! I—that is—Ned—er, Mr. Edward Hartley," corrected Miss Ann, breathlessly, trying to pull away her hands, which had somehow been caught in the man's eager grasp. "If you'll come down and sit up—I mean, come up and sit down—and excuse me—just a minute," she panted. And then she was gone.

The three little girls from across the street went home, treading softly. The man dropped himself into one of the veranda chairs, sighing with an odd feeling of content. And by and by Miss Ann came back, her hair imprisoned once more in the stiff little bun at the back. But the man called her "Ann" joyously as before; and he asked questions—quick, alert, decisive questions. Then he leaned back and told stories which all began alike with "And do you remember?"

At last he said:

"I saw a funny thing to-day. Aunt Hannah Hartley showed me a quilt all covered with names. She said everybody in town was there, so I suppose you know about it."

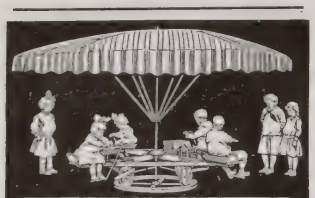
"Know about it!" Miss Ann laughed, though she shivered. She always shivered when she thought of that quilt. "Know about it! I should say I did! I put it together, and even now I sometimes dream the dreadful thing is covering me—and smothering me. Nobody likes it; nobody wants it; nobody is satisfied. It made, really, almost a split in the church; even yet the Briggs sisters hardly speak to the rest of us. Mrs. Jones had nervous prostration, and Mrs. Ellerton brain fever, they worked so hard trying to fill their squares; and little Jimmy Hartley fell and broke his arm, and Mrs. Hartley lays that to the quilt, just because it happened while she was out canvassing for it. It made four quarrels that I know of, besides the trouble with the Briggs sisters."

The man laughed indulgently.

"But why did you start it in the first place?" he queried.

"To get money—money for the church. But our minister says that the real work of the church simply stood still all the while that quilt was being made; and I suppose it did, in a way. You see, we women were really all worn out with it—every one of us; and I suppose we didn't go to the prayer meetings as often as usual, nor to the missionary meetings. We were too tired. Then there was the barrel that we were to pack to go West to Reverend Mr. Roberts. We did neglect that, I know; and I have heard that poor old Mr. Roberts didn't find much of anything that he really needed, in the little box we did send. But he did find a quilt square for the whole family to autograph.

"How many names were you trying to get?"



"Six hundred and seventy-two."

The man whistled softly.

"And you got them? And the money?"

"Oh, yes, we got them, and the money; but I can't help thinking sometimes, what a lot we'd have escaped if

An Unwilling Missionary*

Sunday School Lesson by Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

Considering the Story

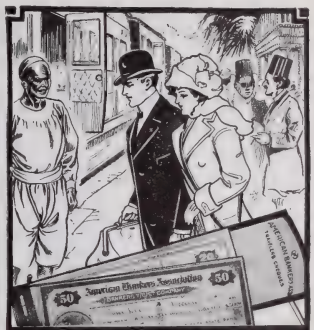
MORE discussion has centred about the forty-eight verses that constitute the book of Jonah than any other part of the Bible. Jesus, knowing that this would be so, connected with this book the greatest fact in his life upon earth—his resurrection: "As Jonah was three days and three nights in the belly of the whale, so shall the Son of Man be three days and three nights in the heart of the earth" (Matt. 12: 40). Jesus again used the fact of Jonah going to Nineveh when he said, in preaching to a multitude: "This generation is an evil generation; it seeketh after a sign, and there shall no sign be given to it but the sign of Jonah. . . . The men of Nineveh shall stand up in the judgment, and shall condemn it; for they repented at the preaching of Jonah, and, behold, a greater than Jonah is here" (Luke 11: 29, 32).

In a company of young people assembled for Bible study, and presided over by a professor of theology, a young lady said: "Professor, I wish you would tell me what you think about the Jonah story." "Don't believe a word of it," was the quick response. He was challenged by an eminent clergyman present who said, "Professor, you think there might have been a man named Jonah; you and I have both known men by this name." "Yes." "You are quite sure there was a city called Nineveh; this has been proved by recent excavations?" "Yes." "You believe two words of the story, then. It is quite supposable that Jonah might have been impressed that it was his duty to go to Nineveh and reprove the unrighteous conditions of that wicked city?" "Very likely." "There were lines of corn ships on the Mediterranean, and a man going to Tarshish would be likely to take passage on such a ship?" "Yes." "You and I probably know something about the storms characteristic of the Mediterranean?" "Yes, I have experienced some myself." "Fish of large size are frequently seen in the Mediterranean following in the wake of a ship?" "Yes." "You and I have both seen and heard of fish large enough to swallow a man?" "Yes." "It is altogether probable that Jonah was swallowed by such a fish after he was thrown overboard?" "He might have been." "Let us for the moment pass over the incident of Jonah being vomited up by the whale after three days, and let us consider if not the thing most likely for Jonah to do after being rescued was to carry out his purpose of going to Nineveh?" "I should think so," replied the professor. "Well, now, it seems to me, instead of not believing one word of the story, you accept ninety-eight or ninety-nine per cent. of it. I will confess that I do not see how a man's life could be preserved inside of a fish for three days, but God is able to do many things that you and I cannot understand." "I believe that." "Well, now, professor, it seems to me that it would have been nearer the truth for you to have said: 'I believe by far the larger part of this story, and in faith I accept the rest,' and in so doing you would not have misled these young people by being a teacher of doubt in declaring that you did not believe a word of it." "Agreed; I stand reproved," was the reply.

Estimates of Jonah

Rev. Jesse Gilbert commenting upon this occasion, calls Jonah "the preacher who refused to go to his appointment." He says: "Jonah's dislike for his appointment was not without reason. Nineveh was a heathen city. A Jewish prophet would be likely to have a poor welcome. No reception committee or address of welcome would await him. He had not been invited, and was not wanted. He was sent with an unpleasant message, a burden of woe and disaster. But Jonah himself has let us into the secret that this was not all: down in the inner depths of his consciousness was a fear that this mission might be a success. The men of Nineveh might repent, God might be gracious, and the city spared. This Jonah did not want, for then he would appear as a false prophet. Besides, Jonah was a Jew, and he did not want God to have anything to do with the Gentiles except in judgment." All of which is true of Jonah, because when God had delivered him from the whale, and he had gone to Nineveh on God's errand to proclaim judgment and mercy, the people of Nineveh did repent and covered themselves, and even their beasts, with sackcloth in token of repentance, and God did show mercy and did not destroy their city. Then Jonah took to pouting. More than this, he was exceedingly angry, and went outside of the city, and made a booth of leaves for a temporary dwelling-place. But he could not get out of God's sight. God supplemented the leaves by making a luxuriant gourd vine to grow in a single night; but he also taught Jonah the foolishness of his retreat by creating a worm which killed the vine, and it withered. And God tried to reason with Jonah by saying that there were one hundred and twenty thousand children in Nineveh who did not know the left hand from the right—that is, right from wrong—and that he had regarded their ignorance and innocence, together with the repentance of the older people.

Jonah a Prototype



Jonah has been called the Peter of the Old Testament. Let us hope that Jonah's disregard for Gentiles was as completely overcome as was that of Peter, and that he afterward went into the homes of the Ninevites and preached to them, as Peter did in the home of Cornelius.

Jonah has also been called the Paul of the Old Testament. It was certainly hard for him "to kick against the pricks"—as hard as for Paul. Let us hope that in the end he became a preacher in good faith to the Ninevite Gentiles. We cannot doubt that the people of Nineveh were dear to the heart of God even though they were wicked.

"Does God love bad children?" a Sunday School teacher once asked her class. And they all replied in a chorus, "No!" Then the teacher tried to show them that it was the badness which God hated, and not the children. But it was not an easy lesson for them to learn, for they had often heard their parents say, "Go away; you are so bad, I don't love you!" Phillips Brooks said: "Man is the child of God by nature. He is ignorant and rebellious—the prodigal child of God; but his ignorance and rebellion never break that first relationship. It is always a child ignorant of his Father; always a child rebellious against his Father. That is what makes the tragedy of human history, and prevents human sin from becoming an insignificant and squalid thing. To reassert the fatherhood and childhood as an unlost truth, and to re-establish its power as a central fact of life; to tell men that they were, and to make them actually be, the sons of God—that was the purpose of the coming of Jesus, and the shaping power of his life."

Sunday School Lesson

We have in Jonah preaching to the heathen in Nineveh a missionary movement that antedates by nearly twenty-seven hundred years the missionary movement under William Carey! The book of Jonah is a missionary book in the midst of the Old Testament, and as such is the wonder of the ages. It is certain proof that our God is the same yesterday, to-day and forever.

A Mission Like Jonah's

We can think of nothing to compare in modern missions with Jonah's errand to Nineveh but the description of a missionary journey recently made in China by Dr. Corbett and Rev. Charles Ernest Scott:

"The leading man escorted us from the village and after a two hours' journey we stopped to preach in a large market town of three thousand families, which supplies all the surrounding little villages with general stores. Such centres are all more hardened to the truth than is the case in the little villages, and everybody's object seems to be to drive a sharp bargain. On such a journey through the country one is struck by the vastness of the population. From any point in China, one sees many clumps of trees on the horizon, each clump a village, and the traveler is ever the centre of a large circle of heathen villages, with only an occasional Christian family. Many of these inhabitants, adults as well as children, have never seen a foreigner. The first impression as one enters these villages is that of desolation and squalor, narrow streets, blank, dull mud walls, dogs barking and snarling, naked children running away in fear, and wretched women. Passing through villages ghastly with cholera, big market towns heavy with dirt and sordidness, large fields where whole villages were gathered to rake every blade of dry grass and stubble to meet the winter famine, we came to a mountain hamlet, to which, thirty-six years ago, Dr. Corbett had made his way. Here we had an especially hearty welcome, almost the entire village now being Christian. We conducted a solemn little service in this eagle's nest by torchlight, near the body of a dead elder for whom the people mourned. The next morning I was awakened by the schoolboys hanging over my cot, in which, as usual, I slept in the courtyard. Curiosity was limitless here as everywhere in China, and I was forced to give an open-air exhibition of a Christian toilet. The mission boys get hold of my heart-strings; they are such a striking contrast, with their clean-shaven heads, neatly braided queues, and decent clothing, to the heathen children. Certainly the hope of China is in such as these. That day we held five communion services. The communion sets generally consisted of a native rice bowl from which to drink the wine, and a plate or mat made of green stalks on which were bits of coarse bread."

Through the labors of thousands of just such missionaries a New China is rising to-day.

A Hint for Primary Teachers

A little boy only four years of age often begged his mother to tell him a Bible story. "What story do you want to hear?" she asked. "Tell me about Donah (Jonah) and the whale," he invariably replied. So you can tell this story with the full assurance that the children will be interested in it. Select as a central truth Obedience to God. Perhaps it would be best to begin with the thought of obedience and disobedience of children to their parents, and from that familiar experience lead into the thought that there must be obedience, not disobedience, to God. The story of Jonah will illustrate both conditions; the happy ending of the story will be the description of the repentance of the people of Nineveh.

COFFEE CONGESTION

Causes a Variety of Ails.

A happy old lady in Wisconsin says: "During the time I was a coffee drinker I was subject to sick headaches, sometimes lasting 2 or 3 days, totally unfitting me for anything.

To this affliction was added, some years ago, a trouble with my heart that was very painful, accompanied by a smothering sensation and faintness.

Dyspepsia, also, came to make life harder to bear. I took all sorts of patent medicines but none of them helped me for any length of time.

"The doctors frequently told me that coffee was not good for me; but without coffee I felt as if I had no breakfast. I finally decided about 2 years ago to abandon the use of coffee entirely, and as I had read a great deal about Postum I concluded to try that for a breakfast beverage.

"I liked the taste of it and was particularly pleased to notice that it did not 'come up' as coffee used to. The bad spells with my heart grew less and less frequent, and finally ceased altogether, and I have not had an attack of sick headache for more than a year. My digestion is good, too, and I am thankful that I am once more a healthy woman. I know my wonderful restoration to health came from quitting coffee and using Postum." Name given by the Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

"There's a Reason," and it is this. Coffee has a direct action on the liver with some people and causes partial congestion of that organ preventing the natural outlet of the secretions. Then may follow biliousness, sallow skin, headaches, constipation and finally a change of the blood corpuscles and nervous prostration.

Read the little book, "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs. "There's a Reason."

Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true, and full of human interest.

WAS RUSTY AND STIFF

Read what Catharine Coughlin, 126 Edward St., Buffalo, New York, says:

"Gentlemen:—I purchased recently a bottle of "3-in-One" from the reliable store of Adam Meldrum & Anderson Co., used it on a sewing machine that was not in use for the past ten years. The machine was rusty and stiff, the screws were gummed, but after two hours' work and giving it a little of the oil it worked rapidly, smoothly and noiselessly. I never used it before, not having heard of it. I have given the contents of the 10c bottle to two of my friends. We have decided to use for the future the oil "3-in-One" on our sewing machines."

Help from Within

THERE is nothing more mysterious than the connection between the heart and the face. Sometimes it is given to a bad man to impose the opinion upon others that he is good. His face and his speech may alike deceive the beholder; but this is exceptional. As a rule, the grasping man, the cruel man, the impure man, bears his character written upon his face.

Especially does the intemperate man carry, plainly visible to all beholders, the record of his excesses. It is engraved upon his eyes, his mouth, his cheeks. At first, he feels shame when he sees his swollen and discolored flesh and his bleared eyes; but, little by little, the stupor bred by alcohol overtakes him, and he ceases to care for anything beyond the gratification of his own vile appetite. "I am a drunkard," "I am a libertine," "I am a thief," is the label upon the face of the wicked man, and he cannot rub it out.

Fifty years ago, there lived in a New England community an industrious and efficient miller. Early and late the humming of his mill was heard by the passerby. From far and near men came to him for the grinding of their corn. His children grew up to be useful men and women. His wife, like himself, was a member of the church.

When he had reached the age of sixty, he sold his mill and removed to a city not far away. Everybody knew that he had prospered, and nobody begrudged him his gains. He had worked hard and well, had invested his earnings prudently, had contributed his share to all local enterprises, and his neighbors were willing that he should retire from business and go where his investments were greatest, and where the last years of his life might be made most interesting.

For five years he remained away; but one Sunday his neighbors found him in the village church. He sat quietly through the service. When the last hymn was given out, he rose and went forward.

"I would like to speak a word," he said in a trembling voice. "I have a confession to make. You think that I am a good man. I am not. I am a thief. Every week while I was with you I stole. Your sacks of meal were often short in weight. I often credited you with less corn than you brought. But some strange power made me keep a record of my thefts. No one else can read it, but I can. I have wept over that record. Since I went away and have had time to think, my sin has troubled me more than ever it did before. I have no peace of my life. I have come back with money enough to pay up the men I have wronged, and I now confess my sin before you all, and promise to lead a Christian life henceforward until I die."

There were no dry eyes in the congregation when he concluded. With absolutely no danger of detection, but simply through the monitions of a faithful conscience, he had humbled himself in the dust and had come back to repay those whom he had robbed.

Everyman's Car

The Brush Runabout

$450

TWO qualities of the Brush Runabout make it an ideal car for women.

These are its simplicity and its absolute dependability.

These qualities have been demonstrated publicly again and again.

It is so simple a child can run it—so dependable it is a perfect business vehicle.

A WOMAN who drives an automobile wants a car that does not get out of order. She wants no complicated mechanism to worry her. She wants a motor which she can crank easily. She wants to drive with as little recourse as possible to gear shifts, levers, foot pedals, and other necessary complications of most cars.

She cannot get these qualities in any big car or in fact in any but one car. The complexity of the big car mechanism is duplicated in every small car except the Brush, which is totally different—the perfection of an original idea in motor car construction.

IN the 1910 Munsey Tour the Brush proved it could do anything any big car could do except travel at excessive speed.

In the hands of thousands of owners it has proven itself equal to meeting daily demands made upon it without mechanical difficulties of any sort at a minimum of expense.

When 9-year-old Louis Abernathy drove it from New York to Oklahoma after three lessons, he proved that a child could handle it. It's a smart looking car, easily handled, and takes one quickly and economically from place to place without need to depend on usual means of transportation.

there hadn't been any quilt—if there'd been just the money, given to us, just given to us. But that's too much to expect, of course. Still—even the money it did bring they forgot to mention, they were so excited in picking the quilt to pieces—figuratively, I mean. But, do you know? I wish they had really picked it to pieces, for I don't want ever, ever to see that quilt again!" And once more Miss Ann shivered.

Before Mr. Edward Hartley went back to his hotel that night, Miss Ann had learned much concerning him, though there were some things that she only guessed—the great surgeon was not given to talking about himself. But this much he did tell:

His home was in New York. He was not married. He had not had time to get married, he said. Always he had studied and worked, worked and studied. This winter his hand had not been so steady. Once it had almost slipped, and that slip would have meant—death. He knew then that it was time to call a halt. He must rest—and to Flecherville he had turned for that rest. Nowhere, he thought, could he rest so well. He hoped, too, he said, that she would let him rest there on her veranda a good deal. He liked the chair. It just fitted. He liked the view of the hill, the river, and the village beyond. He said that he should stay all summer, and he hinted that he would like to try over some of their old pieces for the flute and piano, if she would be so kind; and he added that he thought he ought to tell her all this so she might know what to expect.

And Miss Ann had said "yes," "certainly," and "of course," to it all; then the man had stood up tall and straight, and had put out his hand to say good-night. And Miss Ann had gone into the house, and later to bed—but not to sleep.

By September, when the engagement was announced, Flecherville people had grown used to the stupendous fact that the great Edward Hartley was to marry their own Miss Ann. It had taken them all summer, however, to do this. Little by little they had grown used to the walks, the drives, the tête-à-têtes on Miss Ann's veranda. But even now they were not quite accustomed to the change in Miss Ann herself. Youth seemed suddenly to have come back from the lost years that had been miraculously stored away for her now to use. And the town looked on and marveled.

In October was to be the wedding, and in October Miss Ann received her first wedding present. It was a bulky package. Miss Ann's fingers shook, her eyes sparkled; then the wrappings fell away, and her face paled. Before her lay an expanse of white cotton cloth, crossed and circled with trailing, scrawling lines of red. On top was a note.

"Ned, Ned," she called a moment later, half laughing, half crying, "just listen to this:

"'The Flecherville Ladies' Aid Society begs you to accept this quilt with its best love and good wishes as a wedding present. The society feels that to you, who did so much to make this beautiful quilt a success, belongs the finished product.

"'Yours truly,

"'THE LADIES' AID.'"

Office of
THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

IMPORTANT NOTICE!

This matter will require quick attention by those who are to profit by a remarkable offer we are able to make to our subscribers. The opportunity is brief. Better write us to-day.

To Christian Herald Readers:

Many families are thinking nowadays how much they would like to have a great, complete, reliable Encyclopedia in the home; but the cost is prohibitive. It runs, in some notable cases, from a minimum price of over one hundred dollars up to a maximum of over two hundred dollars for a single set!

We will place in your home at once the great World-Wide Encyclopedia for just about one-tenth that minimum price!

We can do this for only twelve families in every thousand to which The Christian Herald goes, because the offer must be limited positively to 4020 sets. Therefore those who write first will get them.

A New York publisher tried to buy from us those 4020 sets of the great World-Wide Encyclopedia, but we considered ourselves fortunate in having them at this time, and decided that our own subscribers should have the benefit of any good offer we could make; therefore we refused to sell the sets to the publisher who wanted them.

The World-Wide Encyclopedia contains the important facts of all knowledge from the earliest times of the world up to President Taft's administration. It sweeps every field of human enterprise, faithfully records all recent discoveries, traces the mental and moral development of the race, the growth of nations, their governments and their commerce and manufacture. It is a compendium of History, Geography, Industry, Science, Art, Biography and Literature. It is a sure authority on all subjects, and has the imprint and endorsement of The Christian Herald as a guarantee of a superior excellence and complete reliability.

The World-Wide Encyclopedia is in twelve large octavo volumes, containing 9807 pages and 96 maps. It is durably bound in heavy silk-finished cloth, with gold stamps. The set stands 9 inches high and fills 26 inches of shelf space.

The regular price is $30.00 a set; but instead of selling at wholesale to the publisher who wanted them, we have decided to give Christian Herald readers the unusual bargain of more than 60% reduction, making the Special Price (good only for 4020 sets) of only $11.75 a set.

Still more interesting is the fact that only $1.00 need be paid before the entire set is shipped. After that, only $1.00 a month. This makes it possible for families that really need a complete, reliable Encyclopedia, but cannot spend a fortune for one, to get possession at once of this splendid World-Wide Encyclopedia for an initial payment of only $1.00. The balance is equally easy.

We fully guarantee every set. If you are not entirely pleased in every particular, you may return the Encyclopedia within ten days and get your money back.

Really, this is a wonderful bargain. We are glad of the chance to give Christian Herald subscribers such a valuable Encyclopedia and save them so much money. We wish we could supply every family on our list, but this time we are compelled to limit the offer to 4020 sets at so great a discount.

Send at once this Coupon with the first $1.00, and the World-Wide Encyclopedia will be boxed and shipped to you promptly, freight charges payable at your end.

A second short flax crop keeps linseed oil up, but the increase in price in pure white lead paint is not so great as you may fear.

Get at your dealer's the cost of 100 pounds of "Dutch Boy Painter" White Lead, 4 gals. pure linseed oil, 1 gal. turpentine, 1 pint turpentine drier—this makes 8 gallons of old-fashioned paint.

Compare this cost, either by the gallon or by the job, with what you used to pay for paint.

You'll find the difference so small that you can't afford to put off painting, or to paint with anything except "Dutch Boy Painter" White Lead. Write for free "Painting Helps No. 1456

The People of Algiers

THE girls whose pictures appear on our cover this week are typical of the city of Algiers, the capital of Algeria, a French province in North Africa. Both their city and their country have been overrun by so many different nations and peoples ever since the beginning of written history that it is difficult to determine the race to which they belong. The native quarter of the city is usually spoken of as "the Arab Town." This, however, does not properly qualify the population. Arab, Numidian, Berber and perhaps a certain amount of Southern European blood mingle in their veins. Their modernized ancient city has had a wonderful history of conquest and defeat, of learning and of darkest ignorance, of freedom as untrammeled as the desert sands and of a slavery as black as the bottomless pit.

The French, who conquered the land after a struggle that lasted many years, have taken advantage of its glorious climate to make Algiers a great pleasure and health resort. So to-day the linen-clad tourist roams in safety where less than a century ago the fleets of Great Britain and the United States went to put an end to piracy and slavery and clean up one of the worst nests of villainy on earth.

Hawaii and the Philippines*

DURING the past year the A. M. A. contributed over $9,000 to the work of its auxiliary, the Hawaiian Evangelical Association. This sum supported six American and ten native workers, and left something for schools and social settlements.

It is now ninety years since the first missionaries landed in Hawaii. The anniversary was appropriately celebrated by the erection there of a memorial arch, on which was inscribed a tribute to their services to evangelism and temperance.

The Rev. Rowland B. Dodge is now enjoying a well-earned vacation in this country after five years of hard missionary labor in Hawaii. He reports that during the past five years an average of ten churches and parsonages per year have been built or repaired there. The money required has been raised only by self-sacrifice and great generosity on the part of the native Christians. Women have labored with pick and shovel on the government roads in order to contribute to the building of a new church; while whole families have worn shabby clothing, mending and patching it in order to save money for the same purpose. One Hawaiian judge, a poor man, yet managed by close calculation to give $1,500 in order to help the local churches.

Perhaps no missions have been so fully invested with romantic charm and dramatic interest as those in the Sandwich Islands, as they used to be called.

The dozens of delightful books describing the islands (especially The Transformation of Hawaii, by Belle M. Brain), give vivid pictures of the different stages through which the great forward movement there has passed. It has contributed not a few illustrious names to the galaxy of the world's heroes—Titus Coan, Queen Kapiolani, Bingham, Armstrong, Dole, Thurston and many others.

In Dr. Devins's interesting book about the Philippines, he quotes a leading Filipino as saying: "The Spaniards were Christians, but we like the Americans because they are not Christians."

This is a cruel commentary upon our people. Let us hope that Americans and Christianity will soon be associated more closely in the minds of the Filipinos.

Still, we must remember that it is only twelve years since Protestantism was introduced into those islands, and yet in 1905 there were 8,000 evangelical Christians there. When our missionaries first appeared in Manila, an American teacher, himself a Romanist, opposed them bitterly, saying, "You see the people all worship images. Of course, we know that they are simply symbols, but they believe that those images are really saints. If you come here and tell them they are not saints, you will make them unbelievers, infidels, atheists."

Thus it can be seen that our missionaries were urgently needed there.

All observers agree that conditions in the Philippines closely resemble those in the South American countries. In neither does the Roman Church present as pure a form of Christianity as it teaches in our land. If it would, it could do untold good. Rev. Lewis B. Hillis believes that they are beginning so to do, and that Archbishop Harty, the Roman Catholic prelate there, is doing his best to purify Philippine customs and to conform religious practice to preaching. Mr. Hillis says that the Filipinos are eager for the Gospel, but the laborers are few. As four years are required for our missionaries to learn the languages necessary there, it is not strange that few have tried it. Let us pray that more may be moved to undertake the work.

The Ever-Ready SEARS

Nine Models

$325.00 to $475.00

BUSY every minute—taking the children to school, fetching the doctor or a neighbor, hauling produce to market or supplies from town or depot, speeding you around over country roads or city streets, coining working minutes into money. It is up with the chickens, knows no quitting time, and after a day's work is ready for a pleasure trip in the evening.

How Sears Owners Talk

From a Sears Owner in Texas.
"I would not take twice the money I paid for my Sears. I have been offered a brand new $1,040.00 motor car for it, but would not trade."

From a Sears Owner in Missouri.
"I used to live (before I got my Sears) one hour and 35 minutes from town, but now I am only 35 minutes distant. I find that if I give it one-half the care I do a horse and buggy I will have over four months' extra time to spend in a year. I would not exchange it for any other car I ever had or saw for country use. For durability and economy it is perfect."

From a Sears Owner in Montana.
"I have driven my car 2,500 miles over many rough roads and steep hills, and have never been delayed 15 minutes."

From a Sears Owner in Kansas.
"I have an R.F.D. route 25 miles long. I deliver mail to 76 mail boxes and get home in three hours over some steep hills and through 4 miles of bad sand without any trouble. It goes through sand that 20-horse power four-cylinder cars got stalled in."

From a Sears Owner in Oregon.
"Our first test was a hill that has stalled every car that has ever attempted to climb it. A soft, sandy hill, ¼ of a mile long, about 16 to 20 per cent grade, with a 'bench' about half way up, short but fully 40 per cent grade, and we made it in good shape. Photos of us at different stages of that performance would be worth many round dollars to you for advertising purposes."

"What Sears Owners Say" is the title of a booklet we would like to mail you. It is a complete record of the performances of The Car That Works—the SEARS.

Questions and Answers

W. G. H., Saltsburg, Pa. If a person is in debt or has borrowed money and is liquidating his debt and paying interest on this borrowed money also, ought he to pay anything to the church?

A person may be in debt and still solvent; that is, good for all he owes and able to pay as arranged. If he can do this and keep up living expenses also, there is no reason why he should not be able to give a limited sum toward the Lord's work. It is a proper charge on his income and should be dealt with honorably and rather as a privilege than as a burden.

J. C. W., Barboursville, W. Va. 1. Where was Jesus educated, and by whom? 2. Were there two Mary Magdalenes, or was Mary Magdalene, out of whom were cast seven devils, sister to Lazarus, whom Jesus raised from the dead?

1. He was educated at Nazareth, but there is no record that he attended the rabbinical schools. Yet what little we read of his youth shows that even in boyhood he was filled with the divine wisdom. In the collection of incidents legendary and traditional, in the so-called "Gospel of the Infancy," he is said to have been sent to school to Zaccheus, and astonished his teachers by his knowledge. It was in boyhood that he talked with and confuted the learned doctors in the temple. Whatever his training in youth and early manhood, it is certain that with his baptism the full force of his divine mission was developed and he became endowed with all power and knowledge. 2. Although Mary Magdalene has been regarded by some commentators as identical with Mary of Bethany, others, with apparently better reason, believe them to be totally different persons. None of the evangelists state that the two were one and the same person. There has been much discussion on the subject and no one can assert positively either way, but the probability is they were distinct individuals.

Reader, Toulon, Ill. A husband and father died, leaving an estate to be equally divided between the wife and two children—a son and daughter. The daughter married, but had no children. She died without making a will. Under the laws of Illinois what part of her estate does her husband get?

Under the Illinois law, where the wife died without making a will and leaving no children, the husband receives all the personal property and one-half the real estate of his wife.

Mrs. J. R., Solon, Ind., and Mrs. S. E. G., Kittaning, Pa. Name the twelve apostles.

Simon Peter, Andrew, John, Philip, James the Elder, Nathanael, Thomas, Matthew, Simon Zelotes, Jude, James the Less, Judas Iscariot.

J. M. C., New York. Will you kindly explain and give date of the introduction of the "recall" in the State of Oregon?

The final step in the establishment of popular government in Oregon was the adoption of the recall amendment to the constitution in 1908. Under this amendment any public officer may be recalled by the filing of a petition signed by twenty-five per cent. of the number of electors who voted in his district in the preceding election. The petition must set forth the reasons for the recall, and if the officer does not resign within five days after the petition is filed a special election must be ordered to be held within twenty days to determine whether the people will recall such officer. On the ballot at such election the reasons for demanding the recall of said officer may be set forth in not more than 200 words. His justification of his course in office may be set forth in a like number of words. He retains his office until the results of the special election have been officially declared.

[illegible] 1. [illegible] whom were the canon of the Scriptures compiled? 2. Why does the Protestant version reject two books which the Catholic accepts? 3. What Pope [illegible] Patrick to Ireland, and how many were converted by their preaching? 4. When and by whom [illegible] Creed framed?

1 and 2. The Hebrew canon (Old Testament) was compiled, after the [illegible] exile, probably under the guidance of [illegible] and has remained unaltered. The New Testament canon of Augustine was first adopted by the Council of Carthage about A.D. 397, although there is evidence in Paul's epistles that there was an accepted collection of New Testament writings in apostolic days. The canon of Carthage was substantially affirmed by the Council of Trent (1546). The subject is too voluminous to be dealt with in THE MAIL-BAG. Consult a good encyclopedia. 3. Augustine, who afterward became Archbishop of Canterbury, was sent to Britain by Pope Gregory about 596 A.D. He should not be confused with the greater Augustine (the son of Monica) who never was in Britain. Patrick, who had been a captive in Ireland in his youth, tells in his own writings how he was called to missionary work there afterward by a vision. Like Paul, he was not disobedient to the heavenly vision. He declares that he received no call from any earthly source, neither Pope nor bishop. His mission was from God. 4. There is a tradition that the Creed was composed by the apostles shortly after the crucifixion and when they were leaving Jerusalem, each contributing a part. This, however, is unauthentic. It is now generally admitted that the Creed, in its present form, was not in existence earlier than the fourth century. Its authorship cannot be determined.

F. H. D., Lacombe, Can. 1. The first Sunday School was that of Robert Raikes, a printer of Gloucester, England, in 1784. The earliest in America of which we have any record were the Methodist Sunday Schools introduced here under Bishop Asbury shortly after they were established in England. Thomas Henshaw had a Methodist Sunday School in Hanover County, Va., in 1786. 2. "The laborer is worthy of his hire." Salvation is free, but the workers who are devoting their lives to the spread of the Gospel need to be supported. It would be a mean church indeed that denied its faithful minister a living salary. Some may be overpaid, but the great majority are insufficiently remunerated. This is particularly true of certain denominations. The Lord provides, it is true; but this fact does not relieve us from doing our duty under the circumstances, as in such case we are the instruments through which he makes provision. Jesus made no reflections on those who gave gifts to the Lord's treasury in the right spirit, although he condemned the ostentatious giver. Paul approved those who gave liberally of their substance to the Lord's work.

W. P. R., Emaus, Pa. Please tell me what is meant by bimetallism.

The term is employed to describe a financial system wherein gold and silver are used as standard money and coined without limit at a fixed ratio. Bimetallism proper implies, first, that the money unit shall rest upon two metals; second, that these metals shall enjoy equal and unlimited coinage privileges; third, that they shall be connected by a fixed and definite legal ratio; and, fourth, that the coins made from them shall be a full legal tender.

T. M. K., Northfield, Vt. Was Jesus happy when on the way to the cross? Some think that because he was doing the Father's will, therefore he must have been happy even in the midst of suffering.

In the narratives of the evangelists we find only the impression that he was filled with sorrow. From the time of the agony in the garden (see Matt. 26: 37) till the last cry on the cross, this cloud was not lifted. On the way to Calvary, together with his sorrow for the people who "knew not what they did"—who were now as ready to mock and revile him as they were only a short time before to joyfully acclaim him—there must have been a deeper burden of sadness for his base betrayal and for his utter desertion by all of his panic-stricken disciples, even by Peter, that weighed down at every step. Yet, wounded, bleeding, and subjected to the worst indignities, he bore it all without a murmur even while his heart was breaking. He was sustained by the sense of his high mission and bore his suffering with such fortitude that even his enemies remarked it (Luke 23: 47). Thus, to the last moments of his earthly life, he was "a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief."

Reader, Kirkwood, Ill. The marrying of a single woman to a man who has been divorced and who has the legal right to remarry is purely a matter for the individual conscience to decide. There are many pastors who decline to marry divorced persons on the ground that it is against the teachings of Scripture. Such marriages, while legal, are unfavorably regarded by many people, although of course there are others who take a more liberal view.

Whitmani Fern. It has very distinct characteristics of its own, in size, shape and growth. Each frond is delicately and finely cut, like the ostrich plume; it is frequently called by that name. Its feathery, drooping form and compact, luxuriant growth will brighten any surrounding. It is a healthy, vigorous grower, constantly unfolding fresh fronds, which rapidly grow to a width of from two to twelve inches.

Boston Fern. This is one of the best known ferns in cultivation and said to be the standard American decorative plant. It is known by some as the Fountain Fern, which name it derived from its graceful drooping habit of growth. The fronds of this plant frequently attain a length of four feet, making it one of the best house plants to grow as a single specimen for table or pedestal.

Asparagus Sprengerii. There is always a place in every home for this fern and it is one which will make the most rapid and vigorous growth with the least care or attention. The fronds are very slender, of a deep green shade, growing five or six feet long in a single season. It is one of the best pot or basket plants for house culture and will thrive under almost any condition of soil or treatment.

Hardy Russian Violet. Of all delicate perfumes that of the violet is the most delicate and delicious and places this modest little flower among the popular favorites. OUR LONE MISSION IN ARABIA

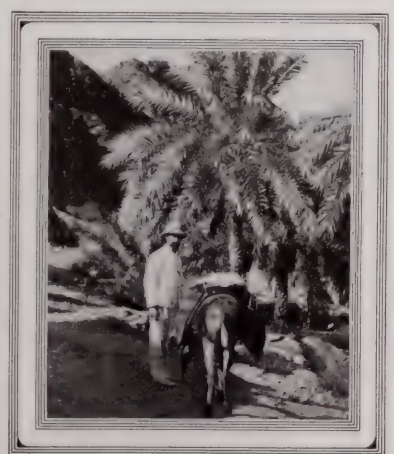
By DR. SAMUEL M. ZWEMER

AMERICAN missionaries have belted the globe in the enterprise of carrying out the "Great Commission." From the Arctic Circle to the equator and the South Sea Islands, one can visit American schools, hospitals and mission stations. Arabia, however, was for centuries left out of the missionary programme of the Church.

When Keith Falconer landed at Aden in 1886, the first standard for Christ was planted on Arabian soil. The Scotch missionaries who succeeded him were joined by those from Denmark, in recent years, and the Church Missionary Society has for many years carried on an interesting work at Bagdad and Mosul in the far north. The only other mission in Arabia, and the largest in numbers and in extent of territory covered, is the American Arabian Mission, founded in 1889 on an interdenominational basis, and still bearing somewhat of its interdenominational character.



It has at present twenty-eight missionaries working at six stations on the east coast of the great neglected peninsula. Of the early struggles and of progress against resistance, Dr. James Cantine, the pioneer missionary from America, writes:

"Again and again, heat and fever took workers from our ranks, until, at the end of ten years, scarcely more than half the number of men sent out remained. Some in the home land called on us to halt, but the fact that our organization was semi-independent made it possible for us to appeal widely and directly for reinforcements. Those whom no danger could deter came in increasing numbers, so that we soon passed beyond that deadly zone of isolation and overwork which hems in so many small organizations. Years have also brought experience, and increasing income has made possible more healthful surroundings, until now our missionaries can reasonably expect far more than two decades of service."

In a new work and in a country wholly Mohammedan, the progress of missions is not measured by statistics so much as by dynamics; not by distance covered, but by resistance overcome. It is one thing to build a railroad track over a wide prairie and quite another to pierce through trap rock for a tunnel. The latter is the kind of work required in Moslem lands. After establishing stations and beginning the Bible work, our medical missionaries through their skill overcame Moslem prejudice until to-day the medical work alone in Arabia would justify all the expenditure of the past.

In Oman in the south, extensive medical touring is being carried on; hundreds of villages are reached every year with the Gospel message, and literally thousands of the sick, who otherwise would have no care, receive the skilful treatment of our physicians. One of the photographs shows Dr. A. K. Bennett on one of his tours in the hill country beyond Muscat. At the Mason Memorial Hospital in Bahrein 13,591 treatments were given last year, and 8,671 people were present at the regular morning preaching. Our Mission has just obtained a valuable site for a hospital at Kuweit, the future terminus of the overland railway from the north. In Busrah, the medical work begun by Dr. Worrall has developed year after year, until now patients come to us from all parts of North Arabia.

Turning from the medical work to that of preaching, it is interesting to note that from the outset our Mission has put emphasis upon the distribution of the Word of God and on itineration. Last year, 4,759 portions of Scripture were sold, and 95 per cent. of these sales were to Moslems. Our seven Bible depots are open doors for inquiries, and here one can see every day groups of Arabs reading the Scriptures, having their objections answered and getting into close touch with those who can lead them to Christ.

Dr. Bennett on Tour in Oman

Educational work is still in its beginnings, as is natural in a country where perhaps 80 per cent. of the people are wholly illiterate, and where the prejudice against Christian schools still exists; but with greater liberty in the Turkish province of Busrah and an eagerness for education on the part of those Arabs who are in touch with Indian life as pearl merchants or horse dealers, there is every promise that the future will see large developments in this direction.

As one looks back over the past twenty years of effort in this most difficult of all Moslem fields, one cannot help feeling encouraged. Where once the name of Christian was a hissing and a byword, not only the missionary but the native helper and the convert are received with respect. Dense ignorance regarding the principles of our religion has been dissipated, and indifference is slowly giving way to a spirit of inquiry. There have been baptisms at nearly all of our stations, and there are those to-day who are secret believers in our Lord Jesus Christ, but who, for fear of suffering shame and reproach, are still afraid to confess him openly.

If the American visitor should sail into the harbor at Muscat—one of the most picturesque in the world—and make the acquaintance of the missionaries there and hear their story of the influence of the Gospel in the hill country, he would find a new significance in the old church hymn:

"O'er the gloomy hills of darkness,
Cheered by no celestial ray,
Son of Righteousness arising,
Bring, O bring the glorious day."

The great "hinterland," including all the interior provinces, is still unoccupied. The Arabian Mission pleads with its friends for more prayer, more workers and more money. The Secretary of the Mission in New York, Dr. William I. Chamberlain, 25 East Twenty-second Street, will gladly furnish information, and the illustrated quarterly Neglected Arabia, is sent free to all who desire it.

A SERMON BY

Rev. D. J. Burrell, D.D., LL.D.*

WHY I BELIEVE THE BIBLE

TEXT—I. Peter 3:15

I HAVE been asked to give my reasons for believing that the Bible is the veritable Word of God. The request is, no doubt, due to the fact that I am a "conservative," and happy to confess it. If I regarded the Scripture as a mingled tissue of truth and falsehood, I could not honestly say that I believe it. But I mean precisely what I say. To my mind the Bible is not true in spots but true and trustworthy from beginning to end. And this is the faith of the Christian Church along the ages. The enemies of the Bible are so vociferous that at times one is moved to lament as Elijah did under the juniper tree, "I, even I only, am left"; but the Lord reassures us, "I have left me a great multitude who have not bowed their knees to the anti-Biblical Baal." Be of good courage, therefore. "God's in his heaven; all's right with the world."

It is a great thing to be a conservative. We are bound to move with the moving world, providing we move not away from the immovable faith which was "once for all delivered to the saints." We are bound to keep open house for Truth; but we are bound no less to double-bolt our doors when Falsehood knocks and shouts "Let me in!"

God in the Universe

Whether a man believes his Bible or rejects it, two things may be fairly required of him. On the one hand he should frankly and truthfully state his position without mumbling or mouthing it; and on the other he should be ready always to give an answer to every man that asketh him a reason for it.

The following, now, are my reasons for holding that the Bible is the true and trustworthy Word of God.

First, there is a presumption in its favor.

If there is a God anywhere in the universe, and if we are his children, he would surely not leave us in doubt respecting the great problems which have to do with our spiritual and eternal life. If an earthly father advises his sons and daughters, in their distress and bewilderment, assuring them of his plans and purposes concerning them, is it reasonable to suppose that our heavenly Father would do less? Plato lamented that he was adrift on a raft upon an open sea with no rudder nor star above to guide him; yet he, pagan though he was, ventured the hope that in good time "the gods would give us a stanch boat to sail in." This was but the expression of a universal instinct. If there is a God he must reveal himself to his children. There is, then, somewhere in the world, a clear and authoritative Word of God. Where is it?

Second, the Bible claims to be this authoritative Word of God.

It claims to be inspired; nor does it leave the meaning of "inspiration" in doubt. The word is theopneustos, that is, "breathed of God." It says, in explicit terms, "All Scripture is given by inspiration, and is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness; that the man of God may be perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good works." And it speaks no less definitely as to the method of its inspiration: "For the prophecy came not by the will of man; but holy men spake as they were moved by the Spirit of God."

The Authority of the Bible

If the Bible is not true, then it sets up a fraudulent claim; but if that claim can be verified we have no alternative but to receive it at its face value and frame our lives accordingly. The question, pro or contra, must be determined by internal evidence. We proceed, therefore, to open the Book: and we shall find that the proof of its inspiration is as complete and satisfactory as that which it furnishes to substantiate the immortality of the soul, the divinity of Christ or any other fundamental truth. In other words,

Third, its claim is verified.

An examination of the contents of the Book discloses the following facts: (1) Its unity. Here is a volume made up of sixty-six books, on a large variety of themes, written by forty odd writers of various tongues and nationalities, writing at intervals along a period of sixteen hundred years, and representing all degrees of racial development from barbarism to clearest light. Yet the sixty-six books thus composed, when bound together, constitute a harmonious and consistent whole; yielding one system of doctrine, one code of ethics, one "rule of faith and practice" for all the children of men.

Shall we call this a fortuitous circumstance? The folly of such a statement would immediately be recognized in any other province. If forty odd persons of different tongues and degrees of musical culture were to pass through the organ-loft of a church, at long intervals, and, without possibility of collusion, strike sixty-six notes which when combined should yield the theme of the grandest oratorio ever heard, I respectfully submit that the man who regarded that as "a fortuitous circumstance" would by universal consent be regarded as a fool. The conclusion would be irresistible that there was one controlling mind, a great Tone-Master, behind it.

A Book for All the Ages

(2) Its completeness. The Bible is the only book that touches and solves every one of the great problems that have to do with human destiny. You cannot ask a question concerning God or immortality or salvation which it does not answer, and answer so clearly as to satisfy the simplest mind. It furnishes a code of morals also which covers every possible question that can be asked respecting the conduct of life. The Decalogue and its exposition in the Sermon on the Mount are universally recognized as the two perfect ethical symbols. When the Book has thus spoken of truth and righteousness it has traversed the entire circumference of human experience; for truth and righteousness are the two hemispheres of man. And having spoken in this manner it leaves nothing more to be said. Wherefore it concludes with the word "Finis." The Book was thus closed forever. There was to be no addendum; there were no errata. That word "finis" is a challenge to the centuries: "I am complete; supplant or supplement me if you can!"

(3) Its up-to-dateness. Here is the oldest book in the world. The Book of Job had been written three thousand years when our own Chaucer first opened the springs of "English undefyled." The Book of Ruth was twenty-five hundred years old when America was discovered. Yet there are hundreds of millions of people who read their Bibles daily and find them fresh as the break of day. This is because the Book was adjusted in the beginning, to all the vicissitudes of time and the progress of coming ages. Its truths, its ethical precepts, its "exceeding great and precious promises," are like Oriental spices, which the more they are rubbed give forth the more of fragrant sweetness. The Gospel is "good news." It is as new and fresh as when the Evangel came to paradise. It is the last tidings from the heaven of a loving God.

The Certainty of Bible Truth

(4) Its tone of authority. It might be supposed that a book dealing with spiritual truths, all of which lie beyond the purview of the physical sense, would speak with some measure of reserve or uncertainty; but there are no "ifs" or "perhapses" or "peradventures" here. How could a divine book speak that way? We want no guesses about life and immortality. We must know. We want authority; and there can be no final authority, with respect to these problems, except a divine ipse dixit. Wherefore the Book says always "Yea and amen," and "Thus saith the Lord," and "Verily, verily, I say unto you."

Put an "if" into the Decalogue and you lay a charge of dynamite under the morality of men and nations. Put an "if" under the manger at Bethlehem and you destroy the happiness of a million homes. Put an "if" under Calvary and you make us of all men most miserable. Put an "if" under the empty sepulchre in Joseph's garden, and our visions of life and immortality vanish into thin air. But blessed be God, there are no "ifs" in the Bible. It gives no uncertain sound. It speaks as the oracles of God.

(5) Its truth; its faultless, flawless truth. The claim of absolute inerrancy is not made for any current version of the Scriptures. It would be singular indeed if the hundreds of current versions were so absolutely identical as to show no discrepancies. Let it be noted, however, that these discrepancies are so insignificantly slight as not to affect in the slightest degree the integrity of the doctrinal and ethical teaching. And let it be observed also—and this I wish to emphasize—that they are such as to convince any candid mind that they were not in the original but have crept into the text in the process of translation and transmission. This being true, they furnish of themselves a mighty argument for the absolute inerrancy of the original autograph.

If it be replied that no man living has ever seen that "original autograph" and that we are not practically concerned with it, we answer that the objection proves either too little or too much. For, by the same token, no living man has ever seen the incarnate Word of God. He lived only thirty years in this world of ours and then vanished. The only knowledge that we have of him, apart from the Scriptures, is through his followers; for every Christian is, so to speak, a current version of the incarnate Word. Christ, like the Bible, has suffered by transcription through the ages.

The Bible the Only Authentic Record

It is nevertheless of supreme importance that we shall believe that Christ, as he once lived on earth, was the perfect Son of God. And the very mistakes of believers in their earnest yet inadequate efforts to copy his life and character are evidences of his perfection. We are ever striving to get back to the original Christ; precisely as reverent students of the Scriptures seek, by both textual and historical criticism, to reach the "original autograph," that is, the "first edition" of the written Word of God.

If the destructive critics were to be taken at their word the Bible is full of frightful errors. Its prophecies have failed, its history is not historical, its science is unscientific, its stories are myths, its facts are fabulous; and there is practically nothing trustworthy in it. We make bold to affirm, on the contrary, that as yet the destructive critics have not been able to produce a single error or discrepancy which cannot be most reasonably explained as either purely imaginary or unimportant.

Of its ten thousand prophecies not one has miscarried yet. The owl and bittern, dwelling among the ruins of innumerable cities on which the curse of divine judgment was pronounced in olden times, confirm their truth.

The history of the Bible is the only authentic history of the world. It is a deep river, flowing backward in its course past the ruins of antiquity, past the confusion of tongues, past the deluge and the creation, past the solitude of primeval ages, past the floating nebulæ, and still beyond to the ineffable glory where it finds its source beneath the heavenly throne, as it is written, "In the beginning, God."

And that history has come out of the ordeal of long centuries of criticism without a successful challenge. Archæologists are unearthing confirmations every day. It used to be said, for example, that the Battle of the Four Kings was purely fabulous; till along came a man with a spade and dug up a royal library in the valley of the Euphrates, bearing date of 640 B.C., wherein were found the names of the Four Kings. This man with the spade is continually verifying the historicity of the Bible in that way.

Impregnable and Indestructible

The same can be affirmed of its science. It is frequently said that "the Bible was not intended to be a scientific book," giving the impression that it makes little difference whether its scientific statements are trustworthy or not. The question, however, is not whether the Bible was intended to be a scientific book, but whether it is true or not. Falsus in uno, falsus in omnibus. If the Bible cannot be trusted at this point, what ground have we for committing ourselves to its guidance in spiritual things? You have impugned the veracity of your witness.

Fourth, its indestructibility.

No other book has ever provoked such fierce opposition. If fires and acids could have destroyed it, it would have been lost and forgotten long ago. The ancient cities of the world were lit with bonfires of Bibles; yet the Book survives without the smell of fire upon it. The corrosive acids of unfair criticism have been poured upon it from time immemorial; but they have not destroyed a single page of it. The Book is its own greatest miracle. It stands, to use the words of Gladstone, as "the impregnable

How Aunt Hannah Helped

'OH DEAR! another famine, and in Chiny, too! I did hope there wouldn't be no more famines, but it has come, an' now the question is, what can I do to help?"

"I don't see that you can do anything, Aunt Hannah. There's more suffering in this country, yes, right in our midst, than we can alleviate, and China is so far away. It isn't as though they were our neighbors, and——"

"But they be our neighbors. Their and jines ourn down there. It does really seem as if the Lord meant that we in this country should help 'em. Of course there's sufferin' here, but people don't need to go hungry, an' to think of them poor little children starvin' to death or bein' sold to some heartless monster who traffics in human souls, jest hants me till I've got to do somethin'. I sent five dollars to the other famines, an' I've jest got to give somethin' to this one somehow. I'll go home an' think it over."

As she rose to depart the perplexed, worried look on her face disappeared, and with a sigh of relief she exclaimed, "There! I have an idee! I'll tell you about it bime-by." And, knitting work in hand, she hastened homeward to put the "idee" into practice.

A few days later she appeared again, with a beaming face, and this is the story as she told it:

"You know them brass-headed andirons of mine that Great-granther Frost give me, that come down from Colonial times? Well, Squire Pratt's wife saw 'em when she come to get some sewin' done, an' said she'd give me five dollars for 'em. I told her I couldn't think of partin' with 'em. I've set a store by 'em, an' kept 'em polished so you could see your face in them brass balls on top, but lately I hain't seen nothin' but starvin' Chinese faces in 'em, so I concluded to let 'em go, an' took 'em out of the fireplace an' put in a pair of iron ones I had in the garret. That very evening, who should come in but two of my girls with their beaus!

"'Why, Aunt Hannah!' they cried out, 'where's them andirons we've admired so much?' Then I told 'em what I'd planned to do with 'em, but they said five dollars wa'nt 'nough for such a treasure, an' only give 'em time an' they'd raise that money somehow. So they went to see the others, an' one said she'd go without the new gloves she was jest goin' to buy, an' nother'd go without a belt, an' nother a collar, an' they asked their beaus to give up the entertainment they'd planned on and give the price of the tickets. So in one way an' 'nother the money was raised. I was so glad, for I did hate to part with 'em. So you see, if I'm goin' to hold on to these young people the Lord has given into my care, an' keep them out of the traps Satan is settin' fer 'em in this village, I've got to keep my house pleasant. So I light the big lamp and keep a bright fire an' encourage 'em to come here for their little treats, an' I cook the oysters for their spreads, an' help them plan out candy pulls, and get up other amusements."

She did not add that she baked delicious cookies and old-fashioned gingerbread of her own to help out in their good times. She believes heartily in the Gospel of home-made fun as the best weapon with which to fight the dangerous "down street" allurements; and the fact is, she is slowly but surely educating the people of this village to feel that the people even at the ends of the earth are our neighbors, and that God wants us to share our blessings. In ways best known to herself she succeeded in raising ten dollars, which was soon on the way to New York to help swell that "famine fund" in which we all now take a deep interest, thanks to Aunt Hannah.

MRS. MARY B. WINGATE.

The "Old Path" and the New

By P. G. MEATH

A CERTAIN rabbi, speaking of the conciseness of the truth according to the Mosaic Dispensation, declared he could tell the whole truth while he stood on one foot. But much more concise still, according to the Christian Dispensation, the whole truth can be told in a breath. And to be born of the Spirit of God, and to know Jesus Christ as one's personal Saviour, is the whole truth in a few words. And that it has been the purpose of our Lord to make the truth so plain, brief and reasonable we cannot fail to see. It is written so plainly that "wayfaring men, though fools, might not err therein."

Primitive Christians loved the simple truth and obeyed it. They attended the house of the Lord for devotion and instruction. They were there to know God's will and his pleasure concerning them. They received what they sought for—spiritual power. The hungry lions, the stake and place of torture could not shake their faith in God nor intimidate them in their vindication of truth.

MUCH of modern Christianity has wandered far from this standard. They want what they call "a good time" in the house of God. The preacher must be entertaining at the expense of the truth, or look up some other field of labor. Eating, drinking, social and theatrical entertainments are usual in the house of God, and we might add that quite a fraction of modern Christianity has become an elementary school for the cultivation of theatrical talent, and without doubt they bring forth much fruit in that line. In the last thirty years, theatres and theatrical talent have greatly increased. Saloons in every quarter have found it profitable to throw open their doors to unemployed talent. In our day, that the world is a stage more truly than ever before is no dream.

To modern Christians truth has become insipid. They must have something to please the senses and feed their vanity, let come what will. To them the house of God is no longer sacred. It has become a workshop, a club-house, a restaurant, a vaudeville theatre. The crucifixion of our Lord, solemn and sacred as it is, is put on the stage as a play. It seems that there is no limit to what we may look for in modern Christianity.

In the Primitive Church there was no delusion or false mediation between the sinner and his God. Christ alone was his Mediator and Advocate. With worshipers in those days, God was a pure Spirit, and could only be worshiped in Spirit and in truth. Foolish rites, heartless ritualism, relics and statuary—which is, to say the least, modern idolatry—had no place in the Primitive Church. And, let us ask, can the wise and just do other than admit that all this is a grave reflection on an all-wise Creator?

WHY it is that a way marked out by God himself, so plain, wise and logical, could by men supposed to be possessed of reason be made so mysterious, absurd and complicated is a matter hard to explain. That such delusion was to come to pass, Paul tells us in II. Thes. 2.

If ever the call of the prophet Jeremiah should be heeded, it is now. Jer. 6: 16: "Thus saith the Lord, stand ye in the ways, and see, and ask for the old paths, where is the good way, and walk therein, and ye shall find rest for your souls."

What a blessing it would be if all that call upon the name of Christ would go back to the King's good old highway once more—the way of meekness, humility and spiritual life! The coveted place of a disciple of Jesus who would accept his teaching and walk in his steps, is that of humility and meekness. What a farce it is to call the high and haughty—living in palaced homes, in opulence and ease, vying with the princes of the earth—followers of the meek and lowly Nazarene, who had not where to lay his head!

Seeing in this life we have but one life to live, and in that so much at stake, why should we not take the sure way—God's Word and companionship—that is so freely offered to us, rather than that of frail humanity, that with all its boasted inerrancy bears a record of wicked and grievous error? When standing before the Judge of all the earth, is it through faith in man and his word we are to be justified, rather than in the Word and companionship of our God?

EVERY man ought to be a member of some Christian organization; but what is of much more value to him is that he be born again, possessed of the spirit of Jesus Christ, whom to know is life eternal. And fortunately for us, every man can have this blessing who is willing to pay the price. Our Lord in his own Word says: "I have finished the work Thou gavest me to do." And we know it is a finished work. Every man who seeks with the whole heart will surely find.

With reference to our knowledge and possession of the one thing needful, the following texts in God's Word speak with no uncertain sound:

Rev. 3: 20: "Behold, I stand at the door, and knock. If any man hear my voice and open the door, I will come in to him, and will sup with him, and he with me." I. Cor. 3: 16: "Know ye not that ye are the temple of God, and that the Spirit of God dwelleth in you?" I. Cor. 6: 19: "Know ye not that your body is the temple of the Holy Ghost, and ye are not your own?" Eph. 2: 22: "In whom ye are builded together for a habitation of God through the Spirit." I. John 4: 13: "Hereby know we that we dwell in him, and he in us."

This is the truth that, once and for all time, was delivered to the faithful. With the true Christian there can be no room for doubt. When a man is the temple of God, possessed of the Spirit of God, how can there be room for doubt? And let us add, no room for bigotry, persecution and self-righteousness. With no shadow of doubt, he finds the "old path" the way of increasing pleasantness as he journeys homeward.

ALL HAIL, O AIRSHIP!

SAILING on high in the silvery sky,
Where never a mortal man
Was seen before since the long, long score
Of the centuries began;

Dancing through space at a marvelous pace,
Which halts our startled breath,
Goes the aeroplane—that triumph of brain—
As it challenges life and death.

Plowman and clerk must stop their work,
And banker and statesman too,
As the airship proud surmounts each cloud,
Till it fades from our wondering view.

As the coach so slow went long ago,
So automobile and car
Must follow soon, as beside the moon
We ride through the heavens afar.

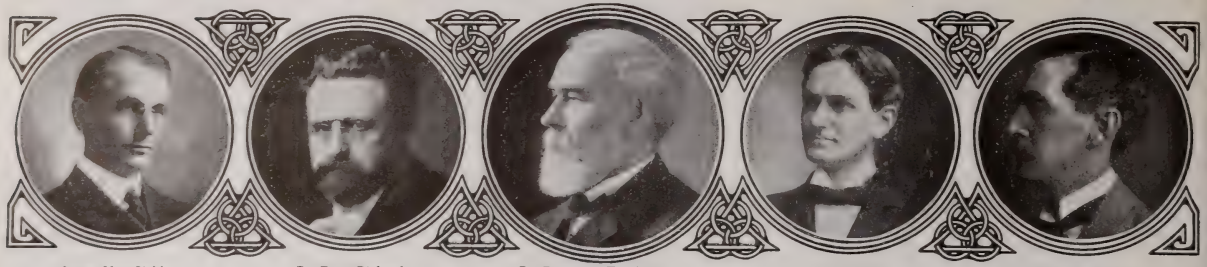
THE QUESTION

WERE the whole world good as you—not an atom better—
Were it just as pure and true,
Just as pure and true as you;
Just as strong in faith and works;
Just as free from crafty quirks;
All extortion, all deceit;
Schemes its neighbor to defeat;
Schemes its neighbors to defraud;
Schemes some culprit to applaud—
Would this world be better?

If this whole world followed you—followed to the letter—
Would it be a nobler world,
All deceit and falsehood hurled
From it altogether;
Malice, selfishness, and lust
Banished from beneath the crust
Covering human hearts from view—
Tell me, if it followed you,
Would the world be better?

THE VILLAGE EXPRESS

OH, what is this noise and clatter—
The racket outside in the street?
I hear the rush of the wagon,
The running of two little feet,



And above all a gay voice shouting—
It's a voice that I love, I confess—"Look out, look out, I am coming!
Look out for the Village Express!"

And then round the corner comes bumping
A wheelbarrow pushed by a boy,
Who cries as he dashes onward:
"Here's the Village Express, ahoy!"

His face is all heated and dirty,
As he looks he is not a success;
But what fun he has when he's playing
That he is the Village Express!

PRESIDENT TAFT will open on Wednesday afternoon, May 3, the third American National Peace Congress, to assemble in McCoy Hall, Johns Hopkins University, Baltimore, Md. All the Peace Societies of the land unite in making this year's event eclipse its brilliant predecessors in numbers, interest and results. It is the object of the Baltimore Congress to arouse the American people to a realization of what has already been accomplished, and to prove the value of the first Congress at New York in 1907 and the second in Chicago in 1909.

As the commercial and economic phases of war and its national and international effects are now receiving consideration almost to the exclusion of the sentimental, the Congress will, in drafting its results, lay great emphasis on the need for national arbitral settlements under an inviolable international code. This is, of course, planned for its immediate moral and economic results. It would obviate the need for the maintenance of great standing armies, thus relieving the people of this burden on the world's resources and liberating an immense number of men whose energies would be turned to the ordinary producing occupations.

The first peace society in America, or, for that matter, in the world, was founded in New York City by David Low Dodge and his associates in 1815. This action seemed to establish a precedent for the United States, for despite her later wars this country has always been one of the leaders in all movements tending toward international arbitration. National, State and local peace societies have been formed and are being brought into closer affiliation by the biennial national congresses.

Among the leading bodies concerned in the Baltimore Congress is the veteran American Peace Society, of which Dr. Benjamin Trueblood of Boston is secretary, and which has given special attention to the promotion of the permanent international Court of Arbitration, the distribution of peace literature, and the improvement of international laws. Another leading body which will participate is the Lake Mohonk Conference on International Arbitration, founded by Mr. Albert K. Smiley in 1895. Among others are the American Association for International Conciliation, led by Richard Bartholdt, Lyman Abbott, Seth Low and others; the New York Peace Society, of which Andrew Carnegie is president; the German-American Peace Society, Ernst Richard, president; the Universal Peace Union; the American School Peace League; the Grim World-Peace Foundation, and the American Peace and Arbitration League, of which President Taft and former President Roosevelt are honorary presidents, and which favors universal peace by conciliation and arbitration through a permanent international court, arbitration between all nations, and adequate armament for national security.

Mr. Hamilton Holt of New York City is the president for the 1911 Congress, and Mr. Theodore Marburg of Baltimore is chairman of the executive committee. The assembly proposes not only to discuss the economic waste of universal armaments, but also to arouse the public conscience by addresses directed against the folly and the injustice which flow from war and to consider practical means of making war difficult by establishing institutions which will take away the excuse for war.

Special sessions are on the programme for teachers, and the progress of the peace movement as conducted educationally through the schools will be carefully gone over, and plans laid for still more effective activities in the future. This important feature of the Congress is under the direction of a committee headed by James Van Sickle, Baltimore's city superintendent of schools.

The Congress is to approve and urge the proposed arbitration treaty between Great Britain and the United States, and will formulate plans for cooperation in the coming celebration of the one hundredth anniversary of peace between the United States and the British Empire. J. A. S.

ENGLAND'S GREAT PEACE APOSTLE

A Character Sketch by William Durban

TWO eminent men have become heroic heralds of a new era, an epoch that is destined, let us hope, to be the vestibule of a millennium for which weary nations are deeply yearning. These forerunners of the coming men who will engineer an international armistice are, happily, not both of the same country. President Taft represents the United States and Sir Edward Grey, England. It is of felicitous augury that in the persons of these statesmen Britain and America are thus sympathetically linked. A bridge is being built that will span the Atlantic. Through these advocates the two greatest nations the world has known will proclaim a message that will inspire a thrill of hope in the breast of humanity in every land.

My American readers know their own President Taft, but they cannot so well know or comprehend Sir Edward Grey. Indeed, this British Foreign Minister is in his own country accounted a somewhat inscrutable personality. He is characterized by a sphinx-like imperturbability which has greatly hindered his attaining anything like that degree of popularity enjoyed by the magnetic-souled Lloyd-George, or the versatile Winston Churchill, or the ever fluent Premier Asquith. Outside that conspicuous triumvirate stands their colleague, always cold, calm, and undemonstrative, seldom condescending to address the House of Commons, and even habitually absenting himself from it.

Sir Edward Grey is a phenomenal figure. His clearly chiseled features, his serene blue eyes, his handsome and aristocratic countenance, his slightly aquiline nose, and his limpid but unemotional voice all render him unique among British public characters. He has been suspected of cherishing a sentiment of semi-contempt for the very assembly of which he is one of the most honored and distinguished ornaments. All the Foreign Offices and all the diplomatic chancellories of the world stand in something like awe of this powerful minister. With one voice all his foreign critics agree in rendering him this high tribute of praise, that his word is as good as his bond. Whenever he makes a statement or gives a promise, the one is accepted as a "firm" statement, the other a redeemable promise. Such is the man who holds the most difficult and delicate post in the Liberal Government now in power in England, and who has electrified not only his own nation but all civilized communities by his magnificent, prompt, and cordial response to the proposals of President Taft for an arbitration treaty as an example for all nations.

Sir Edward Grey

The Leading Advocate of Peace in Great Britain whose Recent Speech on Arbitration Evoked World-wide Comment

Many of my American readers may wish to know something more of this English statesman now in the limelight of publicity. The Right Honorable Sir Edward Grey, Baronet, is the third representative in succession of the baronetcy which was created in 1814. He succeeded his grandfather both to title and property in 1882. He was born in 1862, and consequently is still in the full prime of life and vigor. Three years ago he was left a widower, bereaved of the beautiful wife whom he fondly loved. It was feared by those who knew his reserved and reticent nature that he would quietly withdraw from all public life, especially as he delights in solitude and is never so happy as when he can find opportunity to indulge in his favorite recreation of salmon fishing. Sir Edward owns about 2,000 acres of fine land round his home at Falloden, in the county of Northumberland, in the farthest north of England, close to the border of Scotland. He is an accomplished scholar, and was a very close student at the famous Balliol College in Oxford University. He is a fine athlete, having at one period been distinguished in the national English game as a cricketer, and also captured the Queen's Prize as a tennis player.

Sir Edward Grey is not a captivating orator, for he is quiet, low-voiced, and singular in his mannerisms, having a curious habit of fidgeting with his hands, incessantly either putting them in and out of his pockets or lifting them one after the other to the back of his head. He never indulges in a metaphor or trope or makes any effort at rhetorical brilliancy; yet his speeches are listened to with an eagerness approaching reverence, because of their fervent earnestness, high moral tone, valuable lucidity, exact information, interesting individuality, righteous appeal, and recognized sincerity. Above all, his utterances are welcome even by his greatest political opponents, because here is a statesman who despises the arts of diplomatic finesse, repudiates Machiavellian duplicity, and has never been suspected of engineering schemes of international treachery. Integrity has been the keynote of his policy, and he is thus a kind of Cromwell redivivus.

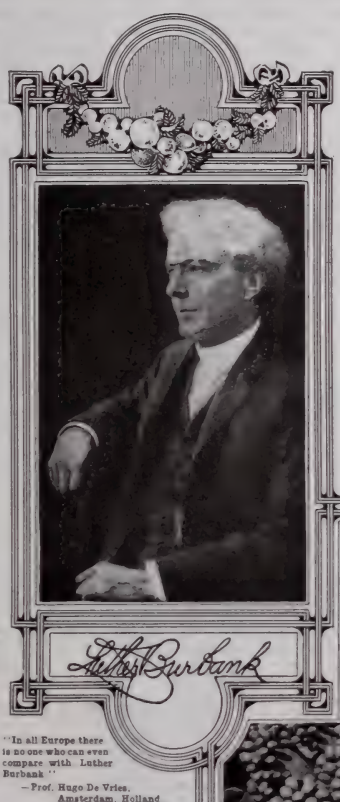
A Wizard of the World of Plants

KELVIN of England in physics and our own Burbank in horticulture are instances of whole-souled devotion extended by brilliant minds to the development of material things for human welfare. No one is known to-day who communes on more intimate terms with the God-given but hidden forces in plant-life and their latent potentialities than Luther Burbank, native of Massachusetts, wonder-worker in the wonderland of California. His achievements proclaim him a genius of a singular kind; for he has been the producer of many varied and useful additions to vegetable life—large and small, native and exotic, commonplace and exquisite, commercially unsurpassed and, again, appealing only to the æsthetic sense. From the stately oak and the walnut to the homely rhubarb and even the sprawling weeds of the roadside he runs the scale of his experiments. Over the laws governing plant life and its development his reign, within certain limits, seems supreme.

If genius is nine-tenths toil and intensive application, it is his; but there is not lacking the divine spark. The keen glance with which he perceives characteristics and adapts them to his purposes is the evidence of the inborn fire. Out of a hundred thousand plants growing for an experiment—a number which precludes individual inspection—he selects one that yields the desired results. The others are destroyed.

Mr. Burbank's unremitting toil in his chosen field began forty years ago with the Burbank potato, which since then has remained a standard for yield and quality. It was but the harbinger of literally innumerable other "plant-creations," some improvements on old varieties, some new altogether, some setting up the claim of hitherto unknown species. Only those were allowed to live that had passed muster before the severe judgment of the scrutinizing master. The others were doomed to annihilation. His genius appears as a national dynamic force when his methods promise to decrease the area of land necessary for the support of man—the promise that a score of acres shall become as profitable as a thousand now. Again it is seen in a playful mood in the rainbow grass, showing the national colors, or in the three strains of the Shasta Daisy; or in the one hundred and thirty-six strains of the New Burbank Giant Amaryllis.

His devotion to his task brooks no interference with his liberty to use his talents in his own way for his high purpose, even if he should be forced to give up a salary of $10,000 per annum with hampering conditions attached to it by a scientific institute. This devotion appears in even a stronger setting when we learn that he has spent, in the course of his experimenting, the princely sum of two hundred and forty thousand dollars of his own private earnings, not one-tenth of which has ever been received in return. "The reward is in the joy of having done good work."



Of this there must be a full measure indeed, if one may judge from the measure of his successes. The "Burbank Plum" is known very generally, but should be understood as generic rather than specific, for there are twenty-four varieties of his introduction. These appear in all the market catalogues of dealers, that is, 100 per cent., while only twelve per cent. of the other new varieties put forth during the same twenty years by other horticulturists have survived the sifting tests of grower, dealer, and consumer. The Burbank Cherry brought at wholesale auction sales, in 1908, fifteen dollars per ten-pound box; again in 1909, in Philadelphia, it was sold at the seemingly fabulous price of thirty-one dollars per box of ten pounds, or $3.10 per pound. The Standard Prune, another of Mr. Burbank's productions, surpasses the best French prune of California in size, flavor, keeping and shipping qualities. His Crimson Winter Rhubarb is a complete success not only here, but also at Cape Town, South Africa, where all other rhubarbs had been complete failures. None are indigenous, and all attempts made for two hundred years were absolute failures. His Giant Rhubarb produces stalks of delicious flavor throughout the whole year, and its yield above others is as three to one. The Patagonia Strawberry is the first of a new race—invulnerable to sunburn, first to ripen, longest in bearing, with fruit almost seedless, palatable even to those who must abstain from the common strawberries. Then there is the Wonderberry, the Phenomenal, the Himalaya Blackberry and the Plumcot, which is neither plum nor apricot, but stands in a class by itself.

What may we not expect from him in years to come when it is known that he is working on several hundred species of fruits and several thousand species of flowers, grasses, and shade and ornamental trees! Besides these, it may be expected that the claims made for his new Spineless Cactus will be proved true. Then the sandy wastes of the arid regions of the world will yield an incredible abundance of food for man and beast. Once established in India by the efforts of the Salvation Army under Booth-Tucker, it may banish the spectre of famine from future generations; for its leaves, joints, and fruit are all usable. Its productiveness under favorable circumstances is proved by Burbank to be at the rate of 100 tons of fodder and 198,637 pounds of delicious pear-like fruit per acre.

Official representatives of the governments of England, France, Germany, Russia, Italy, Spain, Greece, Turkey, Egypt, Japan, China, India, Brazil, Argentine Republic, Chile, New Zealand, and a number of others have been in communication with Mr. Burbank in regard to his new cactus plants. The striking omission of United States officials in this list is hard to account for in a rational way.

While Mr. Burbank has had his share of misunderstanding, prejudice and misrepresentation by unscrupulous dealers in Burbank (?) green carnations, blue roses, seedless watermelons, or hardy bananas, he is not without honor even in his adopted State. March 7, the day of his birth, has been made a legal holiday and the Arbor Day there in his honor. Two thousand seven hundred and forty-six names of applicants for positions on his experimental farms were registered at one time. Six thousand visitors in one year alone clamored for interviews. His work was made impossible; his health was on the point of breaking down. Extraordinary measures were of necessity adopted by his friends and relatives to shield him from this onslaught of an appreciative but thoughtless public. Approach to him is now as difficult as to the President. Attempts to get interviews merely for the purpose of asking childish questions are discouraged in every possible way. Mr. Burbank's time is too valuable both to himself and to humanity at large to be wasted in this way. Beneath the ardor of the scientist and the buoyancy of the enthusiast there is in Mr. Burbank's character that finest qualification of genius—the realization that it is but an entrusted talent, of which an account must be given.

It is only a few weeks since this wizard of the plant world decided to try some of his horticultural theories on a human being. He has taken a boy from the schools of one of the California cities, and is firmly convinced that the right environment and proper sort of education will transform the truant and wayward boy into a stalwart and steady man.

TOPICS OF INTEREST THROUGHOUT THE WORLD

—THE UNVEILING of Queen Victoria's statue, opposite Buckingham Palace, London, on May 16, will be one of the memorable events of the coronation year. All the royal family will be present. King George has invited the German Emperor to perform the ceremony. The German Empress will also be present. May this family reunion be a harbinger of peace between two great nations.

—STATEMENTS PRINTED in some of the London papers say it is understood that King George has revived the rule which obtained in Queen Victoria's reign that no divorced person be received at court. Some relaxation of the rule was made by King Edward. It is believed, however, that though some hardships will be inflicted, the more comprehensive measure revived by King George will be more workable and satisfactory.

—RECENT DISPATCHES from Fez, Morocco, state that the situation there is very unsettled. The tribesmen have taken up arms and surrounded the city. They seem undecided whether to submit to Sultan Mulai Hafid or attack the town. On April 2 they charged down upon the government troops under the walls, but were soon dispersed by sharp artillery fire. France has intimated that she will take steps to prevent any long continued trouble in Morocco, and has requested Spain to second her efforts. To this Spain has given an affirmative reply, thus assuring the world that no extended petty warfare is to be tolerated.

—ISAAC HARRIS and Max Blanck, joint-owners of the Triangle Waist Company, in whose plant in the Asch building at 25 Washington Place 146 persons lost their lives during the fire of March 25, have been indicted for second degree manslaughter. The indictments were handed up in the Court of General Sessions just after the Grand Jury completed its inspection of a charred bit of wood to which a fastened lock was clinging. This was the lock from the main exit door of the ninth floor where the greatest loss of life took place.

—WITH THE APPROVAL of President Taft an attempt will be made to amend the enabling act providing for the entry into the Union of the Territory of Arizona, so that the President will not be compelled to approve or disapprove the Arizona constitution. Two of the representatives have submitted a proposed amendment to the enabling act to the President. It reads as follows: "And that portion of section 22 of said act which requires the approval or disapproval of said constitution by the President is hereby repealed." This will relieve the President of the necessity of throwing out the enabling act because of some of its provisions which are experimental in their nature.

—ANTI-CRUELTY to animals is a dominating fad which in certain cases is apt to run to excess. Thus we have the story of a wealthy woman who, in order that her pet bulldog might have a pleasant and comfortable journey to San Francisco, hired a Pullman for his exclusive accommodation at a cost of $2,000. As a counterpart to this we hear of an effort being made by the Anti-Cruelty Society to stop the "cruel practice" of importing live turtles from the West Indies and keeping them lying on their backs while in transit. Somebody appropriately suggests that the promoters of this effort might do well to look in at the New York subway, where the closely-wedged crowds of human beings would be apt to envy the turtles.

To Close the Famine Fund May 15

FORTUNATELY, the end of the long famine in China is not now very far off. In a few weeks more, the growing wheat will be ripe enough to harvest and the famine cloud will lift. Hope and courage will quickly return to the sufferers with the restoration of normal conditions. It is therefore reasonable to conclude that, unless some unforeseen misfortune arise, the worst of the famine will soon be over.

Meanwhile THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will continue to accept and forward contributions to the Relief Fund up to May 15. All contributions received on and after that date will be returned to the senders.

The Coming Peace Congress

WHEN the third American National Peace Congress meets in Baltimore next month, its chief task, according to the outlined programme which we publish elsewhere, will be to review the economic and commercial aspects of modern warfare. It will thus be to a large extent a Congress for popular information and education. It is astonishing how little the average individual knows of the tremendous cost of military establishments as we see them to-day, and how little he reckons of the Atlantean burden which they impose upon every branch of industry, productive, manufacturing and commercial. Here is a table which will serve for reference to readers who are interested in this practical view of the subject. It shows the estimated costs of maintaining the armies and navies of the different nations for the current fiscal year:

Great Britain	$341,818,500
United States	214,393,595
Russia	253,750,000
France	250,000,000
Germany	314,000,000
Italy	78,000,000
Austro-Hungary	60,000,000
Japan	77,000,000

These figures do not include the British, German or French colonies, nor the National Guard of the various American States, nor do they include pensions. Here is a grand total approximately of $1,588,000,000. Indeed, the figures will be rather in excess of than below this estimate, as some of the individual totals given above are for the last fiscal year and are smaller than the current figures, which are not yet obtainable. Moreover, the cost is steadily increasing, and when it is remembered that this colossal tribute is paid by industry to the various nations on a peace footing, the contemplation of what it would mean in war time is simply appalling.

It would be difficult to construct a stronger argument against war than these figures present. The strain has become unbearable, the waste unprecedented. And when we add to this the additional consideration that five great Powers alone maintain 3,500,000 able-bodied men in idleness for military service, the individual loss to the industrial world through their withdrawal practically doubles the direct cost in taxation to these nations even in time of peace. The economic view should be taught everywhere, in our schools and colleges, as an important means toward the conversion of the world to peace and arbitration.

Society and the Working Girl

IT IS said that the theory is constantly impressed upon the students at West Point and Annapolis that they are expected to form the most "aristocratic" social circle in the country; and it is to be feared that this rumor has some foundation. Otherwise, how could it happen that a midshipman was lately disciplined for inviting to a social function of the Naval Academy a young governess—beautiful, accomplished, and having in her veins the best blood in America, but guilty of the crime of working for her living?

The extraordinary attitude of those who reported the "misdemeanor" of the erring midshipman has properly received the unanimous condemnation and ridicule of the press. No cultivated young man is shut out from "the best society" here because he works for a living. Why should not our cultivated young women, who are honestly laboring for money in a respectable calling, be equally welcome? It is known that English ideas upon social requirements do not agree with our own. Merchants and tradesmen there cannot, unless by special dispensation, be received at court. Working women, no matter how exalted their mission, need an even more special dispensation in order to enjoy exalted recognition. It is claimed that we in America are free from castes and social distinctions; that character, brains and refinement are the only passwords to our most exclusive society; and that paid labor, well done, is honorable always and everywhere. The action of these "middies" was ungallant and un-American. Their idea, carried out to the limit, would socially bar some of the brightest men and the noblest women our land has produced. The snobbish Annapolis verdict is wittily ridiculed in a few lines, in the measure of "Danny Deever," by the poet of the New York Times:

"An' what's the cause of all the muss?" asked Blue-Cap-on-Parade.
"There's lastin' feud! There's lastin' feud!" the little Ensign said.
"Uncle Sam's brevetted duchesses and ladies-of-the-court;
For a workin' person to butt in, she really hadn't ought.
They must draw the line exclusive, and shut out the common sort!
To a free-and-equal nation they've give warnin'."

Our Naval Academy and those who have permitted snobbishness to obtain such a hold there would do well to heed the popular verdict on their social blunder. It is one that will not bear repetition.

A Chinese Critic on Missions

AN intelligent Chinaman, Mr. Lin Shao Yang, presumably a man of some social standing in his own country, has lately favored the American press with certain strictures upon missionary work in China. He does not hesitate to assail missionaries as "so ignorant that they have nothing to impart but what is absurd, contemptible and demoralizing." He laments the increase of their activities and suggests that the divisions in the ranks of Christianity at the present time should make them less zealous about converting the Chinese. He repeats the old-time taunt, common among a certain class of white traders, that missionaries are not desired as patrons at some public inns in China and Japan—which, by the way, is very much to their credit. Finally, he pronounces their teachings, in his opinion, to be harmful "to the people of China and disastrous to the causes of truth, civilization and international harmony." He predicts that "some day a terrible reaction in the definite expulsion from China of all Western religion" may be confidently anticipated.

There is nothing new in all this, not even in the somewhat gloomy climax. Mr. Lin merely echoes old and long ago exploded slander. He chooses a singular time for his attack, however, when the Christians of our own and other lands are engaged in a heroic and unselfish effort to save his fellow-countrymen from death by plague and starvation; an effort that is welcomed by all classes of Chinese, and even by many of the most distinguished men of his country, men in whose presence he would not dare to utter such calumnies against a friendly people. At the present time, there are 91 Protestant missionary societies laboring in China, with 4,299 white workers. Among their converts are 11,661 Chinese workers, of whom 487 are ordained pastors. Not one of them, we venture to assert, would agree with Mr. Lin. The total number of natives converted to the Christianity which Mr. Lin condemns is 278,628, all of whom would smile with pity at his ignorance of what that religion really means. The missionaries have built 2,029 primary schools and 1,116 intermediate and high schools and colleges, and they are teaching 45,730 students. There are 2,341 Chinese Christian congregations, whose members, though they might pray that Mr. Lin might be redeemed from heathenism and bitterness of soul, would not credit a single statement he has made. There are 170 hospitals and 133 dispensaries established by the white missionaries, in which 45,188 in-patients and 897,011 out-patients are treated by skilled white Christian doctors. Would these poor patients agree with Mr. Lin that the missionaries are "harmful"? There are many high officials in his country who, recognizing the value of missionary service and the benefit of their teachings, have accorded them all needed concessions and opportunities. Is it conceivable that these dignitaries would agree with Mr. Lin's coarse characterization of the men and women whom they have so honored with their confidence and support?

We shall doubtless hear more of Mr. Lin. Ordinarily THE CHRISTIAN HERALD gives no heed to such matters; but at this time, when the good people of Europe and America are doing all in their power to help the stricken millions of China, we cannot permit a characterization so deliberate and unjust to pass unnoticed.

General Notes

—A WINTER WHEAT crop, 10,000,000 bushels larger than any ever raised in the United States, is indicated in the first government report of the season, showing the condition of winter wheat on April 1. If everything goes well between now and harvest time, the yield will be 541,414,000 bushels. Although wheat has declined about thirty cents a bushel since the end of the last season, these reports show that the acreage in winter wheat has never been equaled. It is 1,000,000 acres in excess of 1910 and 5,000,000 acres greater than in 1909. This indicates the coming of a certain reduction in the cost of living in the great cities of America.

—JAPAN IS increasing its imports of Australian wool and frozen meats. The people are rapidly adopting Western clothing and a meat diet. A Japanese glassworks in Manchuria is preparing to compete against German and Belgian window glass in Manchuria, Korea and China as far as the Yangtse River. German engineers and factory overseers will be employed at first. The real founder of the undertaking is the president of the Japanese South Manchurian Railway. At present Japan is importing $1,500,000 worth of foreign glass a year, says our consul at Coburg, Germany. In the neighborhood of Tientsin, China, are five glass factories, two of which are in Japanese hands. Another is to be built and will employ over 1,000 workers. Chinese coolies are employed, who work for still smaller wages than the Japanese. Japanese banking facilities in China are good now, but are to be made larger and still better. In anticipation the older banking interests are doubling their capital and embarking in new banking lines.

From Hon. L. J. Gage, Ex.-Secretary of the Treasury

Some time since I received from you a copy of the memorial volume of the Life-Work of Louis Klopsch, sent at the request of Mrs. Klopsch. I have delayed the acknowledgment thereof until now, that I might in the interim read the story of the life-work of this remarkable man. This I have done with a continuance of absorbed interest. In his powers of energy, oversight, breadth of plan and capacity to achieve, he may be compared to the great military leaders of history—Cæsar, Alexander, Napoleon—but how different the direction in which his powers were employed! They led men to misery, wounds, poverty, destruction and death; he led a great following into deeds of benevolence, human sympathy and love. They have destroyed; he gave life. It was my great privilege to know him in his social and family life and to feel the touch of his broad and beautiful spirit. For men like him the world is in travail; may their number be multiplied. "Prinzess Irene" Stranded

THE Prinzess Irene, of the North German Lloyd Steamship Line, under the command of Captain von Letten-Peterssen, lost her way and ran aground on Lone Hill sand bank, just off Fire Island. The captain saw stars above him and what he thought was a heavy bank of fog in front of him, which was in reality a bank of sand. The ship had 1,720 passengers aboard besides her crew. The steerage passengers became badly frightened, to the point of panic; but the officers of the ship, all of whom were Germans and spoke Italian, went about among them, assuring them that everything was safe. When the excitement became intense and a panic seemed imminent, the ship's band was sent to the lower deck, where it played patriotic airs by the hour for the entertainment of these passengers. The effect was magical. The steerage passengers did not sleep, but the captain allowed them to crowd the rail and peer into the mist for a glimpse of the shore, telling them how easily they could be landed in case of great peril. The first-cabin passengers, on the contrary, displayed no fear whatever, but entertained themselves with concerts, recitations, and amusements of one kind or another. The wind and the sea would not permit an immediate removal of the passengers, but as soon as it was possible, the Prinz Friedrich Wilhelm, a sister-ship of the line, was sent to the rescue, and the passengers were first transferred to waiting tugs, and then conveyed to the Prinz Friedrich Wilhelm. To avoid panic, the steerage passengers were taken off first, and the old tradition of the sea was observed, the women and children going first; then the other passengers were transferred. There was not the loss of a single life in the transaction, which was certainly a marvel. The success of the enterprise was due to the superb discipline of the captain and officers of the Irene, and of the men of the tugs and ship to which the passengers were transferred. It was generally thought that the $3,000,000 ship would be destroyed, but fortunately, by titanic efforts, she was pulled out of her setting in the sand, and, eighty-three hours after she had run aground, she was towed and pushed into her dock at Hoboken by six tugs. Captain Peterssen almost went insane over the accident. There is to be an investigation as to the cause of the disaster, till which time it will not be known whether the captain will be relieved from the command or not. Wherever there is human instrumentality, there is the liability of error, and the peril which is likely to follow. In navigating the sea of life a bank of sand is often mistaken for one of fog, and the grounding of the ship is the result. There is a similarity between the stranding of the Irene and that of the vessel on which Paul was shipwrecked, in the fact that the two hundred and seventy-six on board the ancient ship were all saved; but dissimilar in the fact that the officers ran the ancient ship aground on purpose, and that while the passengers were saved, the vessel went to pieces.

And falling into a place where two seas met, they ran the ship aground; and the fore part stuck fast, and remained unmovable, but the hinder part was broken with the violence of the waves. (Acts 27:41.)

Women and Children from the First Party Taken by Tugboat from the Stranded Steamer

Only Wax Beads

In appraising the estate of one of the women society leaders of this country it was discovered that some of the jewels that were the glory of the proud person and the envy of those who were less wealthy were imitation—that the celebrated five-strand pearl necklace worn by the leader of the four hundred was composed of fake pearls, only wax beads, nothing more. She had some genuine jewels, to be sure; but these were fakes. Extreme society women set a poor example when they load their bodies with hundreds of thousands of dollars' worth of jewelry which cannot add beauty to homeliness, or increase the charms of native beauty. The excessive use of these genuine jewels is coarse enough, but the gaudy display of the imitation ones is still more coarse. There are leaders of American society who are all that the public could expect of them, and there are other silly proud ones who reach the limit of an empty vanity, and whose features are mirrored in the wax beads that are palmed off for pearls. The only jewels that adorn womanhood are those of truth, faith and love, which are worn within. They are the adornments and treasures of wisdom.

She is more precious than rubies; and all the things thou canst desire are not to be compared unto her. (Prov. 3:15.)

Strongest Safe for Radium

A Birmingham firm has just made what is thought to be the strongest safe in the world for the British Radium Corporation. It has been constructed as a receptacle for the storage and protection of radium. The height of the safe is only three feet, and yet its weight is one and one-half tons. The double object in the construction has been to protect the precious treasure from thieves and to prevent its loss by emanation. It is understood that lead is the only metal that will withstand the great penetrating power of radium emanations. But any thief can get through a barrier of lead in a few minutes; so a safe of lead is encased in one of steel. The interior shell is of three-inch lead, and the outer casement is of a similar thickness of steel. The door is fitted in a peculiar manner to prevent any escape of the radium light. In the safe there is now a little nugget of radium worth $1,250,000. Strong as the safe is, it will be a fortunate thing if some brilliant thief shall not find a way to get into it and take the fortune. The Master himself makes mention of the insecurity of earthly treasure, and contrasts it with the security of divine possessions.

But lay up for yourselves treasures in heaven, where neither moth nor rust doth corrupt, and where thieves do not break through nor steal. (Matt. 6:20.)

Singular Instruction of Blind

It would hardly be believed that blind children are taught in the public schools of New York in the regular classes with children that see. They read, study and recite with them, and they compete successfully with them in their studies. There are eight classes for the blind, each containing ten scholars. They are taught the Braille system of point-writing, typewriting and map-making, and as soon as they become proficient, they are sent into the regular classes to recite, from which they return to their special teacher for the correction of their class-room work. What medical science is doing for the material eye, education is doing for the mind that sees through it; and both are imitating the office of Jesus, who, when upon earth, took such great joy in opening the eyes of the blind. The one who had been born blind and had been cured by the Saviour, bore this testimony to his miraculous ministry:

One thing I know, that, whereas I was blind, now I see. (John 9:25.)

Dr. Aked's Farewell

Dr. Aked, after sixteen years in the Baptist ministry in England, closed a four years' pastorate at the Fifth Avenue Baptist Church, New York, April 9. The church was not able to hold the great audience that came to hear his farewell sermon. The valedictory was an exhortation for peace in the local church, in the nation, and in the world at large. After saying beautiful things about the many kindnesses which he had received, he paid an unusual tribute to his family physician, thanked Judge Lovett, the railroad magnate, for having put his private car at his disposal for the trip to San Francisco, acknowledged the service of Mr. John D. Rockefeller, Jr., and his Bible class in the four years of his ministry in New York; and special gratitude was expressed at the purse of $2,500 which his friends had given him. Dr. Aked was counted one of the greatest preachers of England. He is certainly one of the pulpit giants of America. As a platform orator, he has few equals anywhere in the world. Dr. Aked's great intellect, his marked originality, his devotion to Christ and his kingdom, will make him a great factor in the Congregational Church in San Francisco, of which he becomes a pastor, and throughout the whole Pacific Coast. In his insistence upon the spiritual interpretation of the truth we are reminded of the description of the preachers of old.

Who also hath made us able ministers of the new testament. (II. Cor. 3:6.)

Horrible Mine Disasters

The newspapers simultaneously report two shocking mine disasters—one in the Banner mine at Littleton, Ala., where 128 men perished, most of them convicts; and one in the Pancoast Mine at Throop, Pa., three miles from Scranton, in which at least fifty men and ten boys were suffocated or burned to death. It is claimed that the loss of life at Banner was the most disastrous of any mining calamity in Alabama, and that the one at Throop, Pa., is the worst in the State since the fire twelve years ago at the Twin Shaft Mine at Pittston, when sixty-four lost their lives, and the fire at Avondale, in which 100 men were lost. There were 400 men and boys in the Banner Mine when the fire started, but some of them escaped through a second opening, which the State law requires in mines. These enormous slaughters are only a small proportion of those who are killed in the mining industry. It is claimed that there are about 7,000 killed or maimed annually in this branch of the nation's industry, which is a fearful price to pay through human carelessness and greed. Human life is wickedly cheap in this country. In some nations of Europe—Belgium, for instance—the governmental precautions are such that the sacrifice of life among miners is not over one-twelfth of what it is in this country. Fortunately each year the laws of the various States better safeguard the lives of the miners and those engaged in other perilous employment, and as life and love shall grow stronger than grind and greed, the perils of industrial life, so shocking now, will be reduced to a minimum. While there may be no wrong intention and no overt act to harm, the carelessness and avarice of the human heart are not guiltless; and of human society to-day, it can be truthfully said:

In thy skirts is found the blood of the souls of the poor innocents. (Jer. 2:34.)

A Little Tour in Newfoundland

Part of the Fishing Fleet Lying in the Harbor at St. Johns

By CHARLES M. PEPPER

"NEXT station, Ireland!"

It was a professor in Trinity College, Dublin, with whom I had traveled through Canada, who made this remark as we alighted one day from the train at St. Johns, Newfoundland. Sure enough, Ireland would be the next station, and not so very far away, as ocean distances go; since it is less than two thousand miles from St. Johns to the Irish Coast.

I suppose readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD have read more about Labrador than about Newfoundland, especially since Dr. Wilfred Grenfell's labors up there and his activity in bringing the isolated life of the Labrador people to the attention of our own people. Labrador, after all, is only a territorial extension of Newfoundland, and sometimes it is disputed where the Newfoundland jurisdiction ends and that of the Canadian province of Quebec begins.

Everything in regard to Newfoundland always has interested me from its history as a fishing settlement up to its recognition by Great Britain as a self-governing colony. It still speaks to the visitor of the old times, centuries ago, when the French and the Portuguese and the valiant Basques from the Bay of Biscay came out annually for the catch, and then returned to their native countries. Many of the names recall those times.

Fisher-folk are much the same the world over, whether on the Devon Coast of England, on the coast of Brittany in France, or on our own New England Coast. They are sturdy, straightforward, open-hearted. Their life is one constant struggle, and its nature cannot be made much easier. In Newfoundland it has perhaps undergone less change than in Nova Scotia and in New England. The people at the out-ports, as the fishing villages are called, are hardy and primitive. They have all the characteristics of a people who for years have led isolated lives and have become very self-reliant.

St. Johns itself is one of the most picturesque and interesting ports in the world. Nature in some way cleft the rocky highlands, and opened up a wonderful shelter from the stormy Atlantic. Once in a while an iceberg drifts into the harbor, but usually icebergs are only seen a hundred miles or more off the coast. Two or three times, when I have had a chance to pass a few days in St. Johns, I have spent most of the time wandering among the fishing vessels, some from the United States, some from Canada, but most of them belonging to the Newfoundlanders themselves. There are also the sealers, which, when the season comes, breast the far northern seas, sometimes bringing back a catch which means a small fortune both to the owners and the crew.

Naturally, most of the picturesqueness of Newfoundland is to be found along the coast, with its hundreds of inlets and bays and its pretty fishing villages. But the overland trip by the narrow-gauge railway is also very interesting. It is more than five hundred miles across from the landing at Port aux Basques to St. Johns. Part of the way the railroad runs along the coast and the bays, then it strikes straight over the high interior lands. Some of these are called "the barrens." There is peat moss, a scrubby growth of trees, and then the larger timber growths. It is after one strikes into the interior that the famous hunting and fishing grounds are found.

Gathering the Dried Codfish into "Kentles" or Bundles for Shipment

The salmon streams of Newfoundland are celebrated. Some years ago, when stopping at one of the little way stations, I met an English gentleman, who casually remarked that he had come out for his salmon fishing. He was not interested in hunting or anything else. It seems a long way to come—something more than two thousand miles—for a few days' fishing.

Last year I ran across the same Englishman. He took our meeting as a matter of course. He assumed that I, like himself, was fond of the sport, and that a couple of thousand miles' journey for a week's good salmon fishing was a passing incident with me every summer. After my return, I was telling of this with some amusement to a friend who lives in one of the Southern States. He at once began his inquiries as to the salmon fishing in general and the particular stream where I had met the stranger. When he had all of the particulars, he announced that he was going to Newfoundland this summer. He figured a week to get there and back and a week of the sport. He will have to travel, going and coming, about five thousand miles.

There is also the hunting, chiefly for deer, and especially for caribou. It did not seem to me that there could be very much sport in hunting caribou, since on one visit, I saw several herds of them peacefully crossing the railway track. This, however, is not common, and I believe the Newfoundland Government has stringent regulations against the wanton slaughter of the caribou.

Newfoundland is not only a land of fishermen. It has timber resources, and lumber and logging give employment to many of the inhabitants. Within the last two years very important industries have been established for utilizing its pulp wood resources. Pulp wood is becoming of increasing importance to newspapers everywhere, and any country which has the spruce for pulp has an asset of great value. Lord Northcliffe, the owner of the London Times and twenty-five or thirty other English newspapers, has established immense works for grinding the pulp wood, and also for making it into print paper. He has provided a model town, fully as modern as any community in England or the United States. Other companies have also gone into the pulp wood business.

It was at first thought that there would be difficulty in getting labor, since practically all the inhabitants of the island of Newfoundland are fishermen. When the paper works were begun, however, it was soon found that these fishermen, from the nature of their lives, had also become expert woodsmen, and even artisans and mechanics. They had learned how to build their own boats and their own cottages, and they were not long in advancing a step further in industrial lines.

Newfoundland not only has its fisheries, which will always be a great source of wealth, and its timber resources; in addition there is farming land, and it is one of the surprises that meet the visitor from the United States to see beautiful and well cultivated farms in the immediate vicinity of the city of St. Johns.

Crisis Reached in China's Famine

Distributing Seed for Sowing

Digging Roots in the Fields

Preparing Food for the Famine Invalids

ALL indications point to the conclusion that the worst stage has been reached in the great Chinese famine. March was the crucial month. Although the latest advices from the missionaries show that there is still very widespread need, one can read in their letters the note of hope between the lines. All are now looking forward with expectation to the ripening of the wheat crop which will take place some time in May. Should the crop be even a moderate one, it will greatly relieve the situation.

The Shanghai Relief Committee has issued a printed appeal on behalf of the sufferers. It is signed by all the seven members of the Committee, and gives in substance the statements of twelve missionaries at central points of suffering in the two afflicted provinces. They state that the number of persons requiring relief is from 1,000,000 to 3,000,000, mainly farmers. Three cents a day supports a family. Of this the Chinese "gentry" are relied upon to provide half, the missionaries giving the other half from the relief fund, various other sources contributing to the total. In the beginning of February it was estimated that $1,000,000 would be needed in addition to the fund contributed by the native Chinese. The stricken area is divided into two sections, in one of which the Chinese government is administering the relief, the other being in charge of the Missionary and Civic Committees. Eight subsidiary missionary committees have been formed at Pochow, Koyang, Mengchen, Hwai-yuan, Suining, Yaowan, Pichow and Suchien. These missionaries are assisted by the leading "gentry" in each place and the greatest care is taken that the donations are applied to the best purpose possible. Grain is forwarded to remote points where distress prevails by means of the Tientsin-Pukou Railway and the Grand Canal. All the high authorities are cordially co-operating.

Last month (March) probably witnessed the most acute stage of the famine. People were desperate. At Hsuchowfu in Kiangsu, the streets were thronged with starving Chinese, waiting for the arrival of the flour on the Buford. Similar conditions prevailed at Antung and Tsingkiangpu. One missionary (Dr. S. Cochran) opened a refuge for helpless women and children and quickly took in a hundred. He was pleading for milk. In his section, Hwai-yuan, about 40,000 were being supplied with small portions of rice. There were reports of two cases ,of cannibalism.

Mrs. J. B. Cochran, a missionary, gives this description of the temple of a city god, which is being used as a refuge:

They are huddled there in that old temple, homeless and starving—professional beggars with their masses of tatters, and conventional cracked bowl and staff; people from the city whose homes have been chopped up and sold for kindling wood, to buy bread; decent country people with their little wailing children, who have wandered in, in a forlorn hope, rather than sit quietly and starve at home; parents who have seen their children one after the other starve and die; children left behind when the parents, having given them their last bite, staggered and fell—they are all there and the old idol smiles benignly down on all these his children.

Two days ago, kind Mr. Liu, going about with bread, said to Mr. Chen, "We will wait till about ten o'clock in the morning, then all who are able will have crawled out to beg." At ten o'clock when they entered the temple, they found twenty-eight men, women, and little children too weak to move, lying prostrate, perforce, before the placid face of their god. The two Christians, sick with pity, gave them food; but when they came again next morning, six, too far gone to take the food even when it came, had died.

Each morning long before daylight these two good men take out what money we can all give (for we ourselves being foreigners and marked men dare not give a cent for fear of mobs) and distribute it in coin and food to those who are, as Mr. Liu says, "about to die." As those two Christians enter the temple, the gaunt wretched figures rise up from all the shadows and snatch like crazy things for the food they are trying to give out. Once Mr. Liu held out a bit of bean-cake to a man who stood swaying as he waited, but the crowd cried out, "Too late," as the man, his hand still outstretched, staggered and fell dead. "They die there," said Mr. Liu, "almost every night. Sometimes only one or two, sometimes, if the night has been bitter cold, many more, frozen or starved to death."

O God, pity them! These dwellers in "The City of Dreadful Night."

Dr. E. Woods, Jr., a lately returned missionary from Anhui province, now in the United States, gives this description of scenes witnessed in the famine districts:

In one district in Anhui 150,000 are suffering. The first thing when in dire need is to part with the donkey or cow, with which they plow; then their farm implements; next their surplus clothing; then the house is pulled to pieces and all the framing and plank sold for food. Having now no home, they take the wheelbarrow which they have reserved and pile on the little ones of the family, the iron pan to cook in and a couple of sheets of matting to creep under at night for shelter, and wander aimlessly begging, the father in the lead pushing the barrow with two or three children; next the wife with bound feet, stumping along, and strung out behind two or three more children. Food becomes so scarce that the sale of the children begins. The father, staggering from very weakness, searches for any sprig of green, to sustain life, and finding none, he turns to the bark of the willow tree, as a last resort. The pallor and dropsy now attest that the end is near and soon another soul has gone out. Ten dollars will save a family of six or eight till wheat harvest. Two dollars will save an adult life.

Missionary Wade D. Bostick, of Po-Chow, relates some pitiful instances of suffering. He writes:

One man who is carrying dirt for me for three cents a day says that his whole family of seven are now subsisting on that, having nothing else to depend on. I am told by one neighbor that another family of eight are making sixteen ounces of meal per day into soup, and that it is all they have. One neighbor family of three pass the day eating only one-half cent's worth of wheat bran for the three. A few days ago a man with nothing whatever on him was sitting outside by the side of a house while the wind whistled against him and the snow peppered down on him. One morning when I arose I found a fifteen-year-old boy just outside of my gate, having crouched there all night when the temperature was ten degrees below freezing. I inquired about him and found that his father, mother and whole family had perished, and that he had been out six days begging without anything to eat. He was in the poorest of rags. I found him a boy of good manners and willing to carry dirt. But when he got up it was shown that his feet had frozen and his toes were already in a rotten condition. Again, when the temperature was below freezing I saw a half-grown boy on the street, stark barefooted, crying like a babe with cold and hunger. I am not telling isolated cases; there are just such as I have told above to be found by the thousands.

All contributions to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD China Famine Fund should be sent in without delay to be of real service, as the Fund will close on May 15.

DOOLITTLE'S DOUBLE

By MAY BELLEVILLE BROWN

THIS story is about two people—Doolittle and the Whelp; that was what the Indians called him, but after he became an adopted son, he was known as Doolittle's Double; and if you once saw the two together, you would know why.

Of course, others contribute indirectly, just as a theatrical cast includes "shouts outside," and "mob of revolutionists." There was Black Coyote, the Whelp's Indian master, and after him a long procession of redskins, each one of whom contributed a scar for the Whelp's body or soul.

Then there was Hector, the abused, scarred little pony that finally carried the Whelp across the wastes of Indian Territory and into the newly-settled plains country of Kansas. The Whelp named him for the brave old house dog that died under the tomahawk that day the Indians came.

On Doolittle's side, too, there were other influences. A weak woman, a dishonest brother, false friends; but unless you lived on the plains when they were in the making, you could not understand Doolittle. To be sure, a long, narrow man, with a long narrow face, and thin lips that snarl forever, is not indigenous to any country; but the plains, with their wind and sun, and vast loneliness, do things with a man of that type which are past explaining.

The smaller settlers on the Big Salt table lands, where Doolittle's broad acres grazed his vast herds, soon learned the manner of man that he was, and took their neighborings elsewhere; so that, shunned at home and abroad, the richest man in all that broad country became a veritable pariah.

Men and horses he had to have, for his herds were many; but they were cowed creatures, of dejected spirit, who received never a pleasant word or look, and carried themselves after the manner of slaves under the lash.

It was a day in late autumn. The wind, waxing fiercer as night drew near, roared beneath the empty arches of the sky, and lashed the tall, dun grass and dried weeds. For miles the Whelp had ridden the pony—at the start but a bag of bones—the only moving object in sight. The creature staggered and stumbled patiently over the half-worn trail, and the rider swayed from side to side. Starvation and exhaustion were about to claim their own, for while the new country was rich in promise, it held no manna for the homeless traveler.

Doolittle watched them coming, his lips set in their habitual snarl, his fingers curving inward a bit. Already in his mind were the words which would send them on their way; for no stranger had been allowed on his place for months. The pony stumbled toward him until the gray-faced, unseeing rider stared him in the face. Then, before Doolittle could speak, the Whelp, wavering, pitched forward into his arms.

The man looked for a moment at his burden; then, calling one of his helpers, pointed to the pony, which, with head drooping to the ground, panted and shivered.

"Take care of it. It's beat out," he directed; and, turning, carried the boy into the house and laid him on his own bed.

First there was a period of semi-consciousness. Then the Whelp—under a roof and with a white man for the first time in ten years—faced his benefactor unwinkingly and unthankingly. At seven he had been a normal child, a bit brooding and secretive, perhaps, as betokening certain strains of New England ancestry. Every impulse of his captivity had been toward getting back to his kind; yet now he met the first one more Indian than white.

As for Doolittle, he looked into the Whelp's face as into a mirror. Long, narrow, thin-lipped and beetle-browed was his face, and sullen his manner. What the plains had done to the older man, the Indians had wrought in the Whelp.

Food, shelter and clothing were given the lad, and as he returned to strength, he returned the favors. His years of hardship and outdoor life had fitted him for labor, and he gave it ungrudgingly. But no words, beyond necessary monosyllables.

Thus, when Doolittle indicated the pony's seamed side, cruel memory dyed his cheek a dull red, beneath its tan. Much he might have told of such things, but his reply was brief.

"Indians." And no more.

The same word explained a scar on the Whelp's face, and the loss of a finger. No questions were asked, or explanations given. Doolittle's snarl might have seemed less imminent, but the Whelp's sullen, averted face took no note. Each recognized in himself a replica of the other, but neither would appear to notice that they were as alike as father and son.

The boy's one companion was the pony—now growing plump and well-fed. One day—the Whelp had thrown himself, Indian-wise, on the grass, and Hector was nibbling about his head and face—Doolittle stood watching them, and a close observer might have seen a quiver of feeling pass over the man's features; but the ordinary looker-on would have seen only the scowl.

The autumn wore into winter, marked only by the calendar, for the winds of fall still beat and pounded. One night—the two men employed on the place had taken a drove of cattle to the nearest railway, and would be gone several days—the Whelp, having finished his double work, climbed the ladder to his bed in the loft.

This loft, over the high room which was the main part of the house, was reached only through a trap-door, and by means of the ladder. The roof came quite to the floor on each side, and in either end, where the roof peak gave room, was a small window. Here the Whelp and the men who worked about the place slept, while Doolittle lived below. To-night he slept heavily, in spite of the roaring of the wind. Subconsciously, there drifted into his sleep the sense of some commotion; then there cut across his dream a sharp,

"Gif it up. Gif it up."

A prolonged struggle followed, punctuated by breathless exclamations, evidently oaths—Mexican, he remembered from his nomadic days—and a heavy fall. The Whelp was wide awake now, and knew that Doolittle, alone below stairs, had been attacked.

Approach through the narrow trap-door was impossible; so from a peg near the window he took a coiled lasso, and swung himself out. Broken glass cut his face, but he knew it only by the blood that ran down his cheek. Just as he swung past the high window of the room below, a gust of wind swayed him against it. The two men who were rifling Doolittle's pockets looked up, to see at the window the face of the man on the floor, staring in with burning eyes, set lips and blood streaming from the left temple—where they had just struck him. Growing white under their swarthy skins, they glanced back at the figure on the floor. The faces were identical. One instant they hesitated, but the vision was too much, even for their greed; and with a cry of terror they rushed from the house, colliding frantically in the doorway, in their haste to reach their waiting horses.

Before it can be told, the Whelp had swung to the ground and darted around the house, but even so, he was in time to hear only the pounding of hoofs down the bone-hard trail.

For Doolittle there was fever, pain and delirium; a time when existence wavered from hour to hour; when the surgeon, brought from the fort far to the west, said that life must go out. To all of these things the Whelp turned a face of stoicism; but back of it all was a hand of tenderness, a watching eye. The hardihood that enabled the boy to serve the sick man day and night, without sleep or rest, came from his Indian training, but the resourceful care, the tender patience, must have had root a generation away.

There came days, before speech was vouchsafed the twain, when the dark, unlovely interior of the log house was as vibrant with unuttered melody as the interior of a long-silent violin. While the two, alone from hour to hour, seemed but the stoical Indian lad and the taciturn hermit, a sixth sense might have heard the music of two natures becoming attuned.

All the things that a son might say were in the Whelp's eyes, as he brooded over the sick man. All of father-love was in the man's face, as he watched the boy at work about the room, or regarded the lean, brown hands, so deft in his service.

It came on a day—the Whelp had finished re-bandaging the now nearly-healed wound—that the man's hand would be no longer stayed, but went out impulsively to the boy's.

"Lad," he spoke softly. Could these broken tones be Doolittle's? "I've been harsh and rough with you from the start. Yet you have been as tender to me as my own son."

The Whelp looked down at the moved face on the pillow—ten years of hardness dropping away from his own—and struggled for speech. Then, from some long-forgotten cranny of his brain, saved from the wreck of his child-life, the words flashed to his lips:

"I was a stranger, and ye took me in."

It was long afterward that one of the men, coming noislessly to the door, stood transfixed at what he saw within: The Whelp, kneeling beside Doolittle's bed and clasping the sick man's hand in both of his own. But, even to the helper's dull intelligence, the most wonderful sight was the light of joy in the two faces—a joy which foretold years of companionship—a joy that each soul was at last to find expression. Universal sonhood was in the Whelp's face, and in the man's enveloping glance was universal fatherhood.

Finally the Whelp's lips opened.

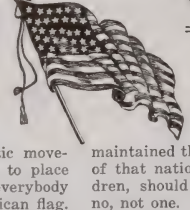
"Just think," the lad almost whispered; "you and me and Hector."

The listener stole silently away.

An automobile is like everything else. To do its best and look its prettiest, it must be clean—engine, body and brasswork.

To clean the engine, employ the most competent man you can find.

To clean the painted parts, use Ivory Soap, tepid water and a couple of soft cloths.



To clean the brasswork, use Ivory Soap Paste. This is the way to make it:

To one quart of boiling water add half a cake of Ivory Soap, shaved fine. Boil ten minutes after the soap is thoroughly dissolved. Let it cool. Keep in a glass jar with a tight-fitting top. Apply with a sponge or a soft cloth, using cold or lukewarm water. Polish with another soft cloth.

For cleaning brasswork, Ivory Soap Paste is better than polishing compounds. It contains no "gritty" substance, and will not injure the lacquer.

FLAG-FLYING HOLIDAYS IN APRIL AND MAY

A SPLENDIDLY patriotic movement has been started to place within the hands of everybody in America a standard American flag.

Every true American should feel in duty bound on all national holidays and flag-flying occasions to set "Old Glory" flying from his own home window or from a flag-staff on the lawn.

A Splendid Sight

EIGHTY millions of people behold "Old Glory" with a hallowed love. What a thrilling sight it would be, what an unparalleled evidence of love of country, if from every house, in every State and Territory, on every national holiday, "Old Glory" should wave.

"My Queen" — Winnifred Robinson, age 14. Won the Gunmetal Watch.

Arbor Day, April 30

ARBOR DAY has come to be one of the most important of the nation's holidays. Since Arbor Day was instituted, in 1872, upwards of a thousand million trees have been set out by American school children alone. Think of it!

If we are truly patriotic, then we must be interested in beautifying and conserving the natural resources of one of the most gloriously beautiful countries of the earth.

Therefore, beyond a doubt, we should each one consider ourself in duty bound on Arbor Day to plant a tree or help some one else to set out a tree, and in honor of the day every true American should raise his own "Old Glory" up into the golden sunshine.

"Old Glory" will say for you, more eloquently than words:

"I love my country; I believe in its beauty, its bounty, its glorious freedom! I too will help conserve its resources and perpetuate its beauty."

Because THE CHRISTIAN HERALD believes in the individual recognition of Arbor Day we are offering you an "Old Glory" Free. (See coupon below.)

Memorial Day, May 30

WHEN one of the foremost nations of the earth commemorates the magnificent loyalty of brave men and women, North, South, East, and West, whose love of country established and maintained that nation's glory, not one of that nation's men, women, or children, should be silent or indifferent; no, not one.

Each one living to-day in this "land of the free and home of the brave" should, in loyal memory of the American soldier boys, set "Old Glory" flying.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD believes heart and soul in individual recognition of this great national holiday, and this is why, at this time, it offers to every one of its readers FREE a splendid national emblem, for you, and you, and you, to set flying from your home window on Memorial Day. (See the coupon.)

Old Glory at Half-Staff

ON Memorial Day the flag should fly at half-staff from sunrise to noon, and full staff from noon to sunset.

When the flag is flown at half-staff as a sign of mourning, it should first be hoisted to the top of the staff and then lowered to position; before lowering from half-staff, it should be first raised to the top.

Every Letter Is Welcome

DEAR BOYS AND GIRLS: Thank you for your nice, enthusiastic letters. Yes, I agree with you, we are the very best Boys' and Girls' Department in any magazine in the country. Hundreds of you have assured me of this, and I want to assure you in return that you fine, manly boys and dear homey girls help to make it so. Your enthusiasm and interest sets my enthusiasm and interest afire, and together we shall soon be doing very big things indeed.

Our Good-Night Verse

From Isaiah: "How beautiful upon the mountains are the feet of him that bringeth good tidings, that publisheth peace!"

Wishing you all, and the grown-ups too, great joy with the beautiful CHRISTIAN HERALD flags, I am, faithfully always,

The Aunt in the Cozy Corner.

Great Chinese Dragon Parade

LITTLE Chinese woman who looked as if she had stepped from pages of some wonderbook of Chi- lore led the parade which on April closed the bazaar which was held in w York by the Chinese Merchants' sociation to raise funds for the re- f of their suffering fellow country- n. Each afternoon and evening ile the fair lasted there were special tertainments in the Rescue Mission, hich was formerly the Chinese thea- , and each night the narrow streets Chinatown were brilliant with col- d lights. The Chinese part of the rade was not long, but it was pic- turesque. The marching Chinamen in native costumes made a real pageant. The costumes were all of silk and of all colors and combinations of colors. The most conspicuous figures were the little Chinese woman and the sixty-foot dragon. The little woman was Mrs. Lee Tow, a missionary. Clothed in her native costume of soft silk trousers and jacket and sitting cavalier fashion, she rode at the head of the procession with the utmost confidence. For a head- dress she wore a sort of glorified sun- burst of brilliant colors and over her shoulders was hung a gorgeous Orien- tal cape. There were several groups of men carrying orna- mental spears, eight of them usually together, representing the eight precious things, a Chi- nese allegorical idea.

The mossonglung or dragon was brought from San Francisco specially for the occa- sion. It was a great flexible thing of yellow silk painted and em- broidered with terrific head and staring eyes in true Chinese style. It was carried by eight Chinamen who amused the onlookers with all sorts of antics and tail waggings. The odd spectacle drew large crowds in the down town districts where the streets were filled with the home-going Satur- day afternoon throngs. About $10,000 was made at the fair and this was immediately forwarded to the suf- ferers in China.

OUR COMFORT CORNER

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

The Mother's Dream

FOR the second time we were childless. Our first dear baby never reached her second birthday. The boy and girl who had so recently left us, were our light and joy. They were lovely children, their faces had a peculiar radiant beauty, and their voices were so sweet and musical that in the early morning, as they talked and laughed together in the nursery, it was like listening to the songs of the happy birds outside the window. God had bestowed upon them many precious gifts, and we looked forward to their maturity with bouyant hope and expectation.

Our hopes were more than realized, for are they not now serving God in his temple day and night, and going no more out forever?

Within ten days these dear children were taken from us, and we knew as only parents thus bereft can know what the desolation was to our hearts.

Oh, the weary, solemn silence of the house without the children!
Oh, the strange oppressive stillness where the children come no more!
Ah, the longing of the sleepless for the soft arms of the children!
Ah, the longing for the faces peeping through the open door!
Faces gone forevermore!

We buried them in one of the sweetest spots on earth, and "until the day break and the shadows flee away," their precious dust is safely sleeping.

After they left us, I sometimes felt troubled lest my dear little children were not among God's chosen ones, but one night I had this dream: I thought that I was sitting alone in my room. I heard the children coming up the stairs near me. Their little feet made the same noise as they used to do. I could distinguish the steps of each. Suddenly the door was thrown open, and they both bounded in, and rushed joyfully toward me, climbing up into my lap. I held them so closely, and put my arms around my darlings, and said to one, and then another, "Dear, are you happy? quite happy?"

They gave me such a beaming, beautiful smile, and jumping off my lap bounded out again at another door. I heard the little feet running down the front stairs and out of the house, and all was still again. But I was comforted by that dream. Perhaps God had had pity upon my weakness, and so had sent the children for that blessed moment to me. But whatever it was, I have never felt uneasy about their perfect safety since.

Oh, the joyful happy meeting in the house of many mansions!
Oh, the beauty and the glory of the children's faces there!
Oh, the eager, wistful faces pressed against the heavenly casements!
Oh, the glad and blessed welcome to us when we enter there!
Faces ours forevermore!

OCTAVIA W. RICHARDSON.

The Tooth-Brush Club

A NOVEL idea comes to us from across the water. Every one knows that in these days greatest care is taken to ascertain the rate of health attained by children in general in our public schools. In each of our States medical inspectors visit every school annually and make minute and detailed reports of what they ascertain. The same system is carried out in England, and among the poorer classes in London an alarming condition of ill health and physical degeneracy has been discovered. The teeth of little boys and girls have been found in an advanced condition of decay, so that many children among the London poor must arrive at adolescence with few sound teeth remaining. Most of them have never so much as heard of a tooth-brush. The teachers have now hit upon the plan of organizing tooth-brush clubs in every school. Once having learned their use the children vie with each other in having clean white teeth. The brushes are bought by wholesale, sold to the children who can pay for them at a nominal price, and given to those who cannot afford so much as a half penny. It might be a good plan to adopt the introduction of tooth-brush clubs in some of our crowded city schools where the little ones are drawn from a tenement house population who have little acquaintance with the simplest rules of comfort and hygiene.

Children and Sleep

IF little children, and for that matter all children under twelve, are to be physically strong, they must have plenty of sleep. Until the age of five, at least, a child should have a daily nap. The hour for going to bed in most well-ordered households is fixed at eight o'clock for the growing child. Many parents make the mistake of waking children too early in the morning. Unless there is an excellent reason to the contrary, boys and girls should have their sleep out and awaken without being called. If they cannot do this and must be repeatedly called, falling asleep again after they have seemed to be thoroughly awake, proof is given that they do not go to bed as early as they ought. Ten hours' sleep is not too much for an active child who is both growing fast and learning rapidly. So long as children are ready for school at half past eight or nine o'clock they may be permitted to sleep later than the breakfast hour of their parents. Breakfast hour for every one should be somewhat elastic. One would fancy that father and mother might enjoy sitting down together and making their plans for the day with the children asleep upstairs, that they might put aside the simple breakfast of bread and butter, cereal and milk, which is enough for boy or girl; and that instead of fretting and fussing because Frank and Helen, Sallie and John are drowsy and come down half dressed, they might let the children have their sleep out.

When children do rise, they should be taught to dress quickly and prepare for the duties of their day.

A Word About Memory

NOT long ago I heard a woman in her fortieth year complain that she was losing her memory. There was no reason whatever to excuse in her case the loss of this useful quality of the mind. Memory is a faculty dependent upon use and attention. Properly used, memory should last to the latest day of life. Any one who determines resolutely to be served by memory will not be defrauded. There are various kinds of memory, some far more worth while than others. For example, one may in these days possess a telephone memory, keeping easily in mind the numbers of the tradespeople on whom she daily calls, and those of her friends and acquaintances with whom she has pleasant bits of talk from time to time. The memory for names and faces when combined in the same Telephone Service—Universal or Limited?

TELEPHONE users make more local than long distance calls, yet to each user comes the vital demand for distant communication.

No individual can escape this necessity. It comes to all and cannot be foreseen.

No community can afford to surround itself with a soundproof Chinese Wall and risk telephone isolation.

No American State would be willing to make its boundary line an impenetrable barrier, to prevent telephone communication with the world outside.

Each telephone subscriber in each community, each State demands to be the center of a talking circle which shall be large enough to include all possible needs of intercommunication.

In response to this universal demand the Bell Telephone System is clearing the way for universal service.

erson gives him or her a vast ad-ntage over some one else who can member neither. For a pastor or politician, a king, or a railway con-ctor, this dual memory is a fine em in the outfit for popularity. The te King Edward VII possessed it an extraordinary degree, and could ithout difficulty remember the name nd personality of almost any one ith whom he had ever conversed.

memory for dates, for rules in rammar, and for the definition of ords, as well as for noble passages poetry and prose, is within reach any one who begins memorizing in outh and never ceases to exercise e faculty. The late Maltbie W. abcock, so dearly loved and deeply mented, memorized one hundred lines verse every day. A lady, who has difficulty in recollecting anything which she listens, and who can port a sermon almost word for ord, said recently that when a child e learned by heart and thus com-itted to memory many chapters in e Proverbs, large portions of the salms, and almost the whole of the ur Gospels. A distinguished teacher ho died some years ago used to ex-ct from his pupils the precise repe-tion of several pages of history ery day, with the result that those ho studied with him have little trou-ble in being letter perfect in anything they wish to fix in mind.

With the hardening of the brain, which often comes to people as they grow old, there is a singular form of loss of memory. The sufferers from this infirmity tell the same story, write the same bit of news and make the same statement over and over, day by day. But they do not fall into this habit until the period comes when the curtains are gently drawn around the present and the images of the past return like pictures hung on the wall, to divert a weary child.

SPRING ARITHMETIC

IT WAS the busy hour of 4,
When from a city hardware store
Emerged a gentlemen who bore
1 hoe,
1 spade,
1 wheelbarrow.

From thence our hero promptly went Into a seed establishment
And for these things his money spent:
1 peck of bulbs,
1 job lot of shrubs,
1 quart of assorted seeds.

He has a garden under way
And if he's fairly lucky, say,
He'll have about the last of May 1 squash vine,
1 eggplant,
1 radish.

ck." He was thinking of Gibraltar, hich guards the Gates of Hercules here the storms of the Atlantic and editerranean meet in a mighty grap-e. Its foot is strewn with the wreck-ge of ships that have defied it; but ibraltar stands. In like manner the ible survives its foes. "Surely the eople is grass. The grass withereth, e flower fadeth; but the Word of our od shall stand forever!"

Fifth, it makes men and nations.

The Bible has gone in the forefront civilization all along the centuries. raw a line around the nations that ave the Bible, and you will then ave divided between barbarism and vilization, between thrift and pov-rty, between selfishness and charity, etween oppression and freedom, be-ween life and the shadow of death. he three great powers to-day are merica and England and Germany; ith one other coming to the front. s for England it was publicly affirmed y Queen Victoria that "the Bible was e secret of its greatness." As for ermany, at the close of the Franco-russian War, Père Hyacinthe de-ared to his people that the reason for eir calamitous defeat lay in the fact at every German soldier had a Bible his knapsack. As for America, its ee institutions are founded on Bible rinciples.

Sixth, I believe the Bible because hrist believed it.

He spoke of it as "truth" and as "the Word of God." He preached it. He ractised it. He made the Bible the etermining factor in the problem of is kingdom. He commissioned his isciples to "go preach." Preach what? he Word. This was "the good seed" hich they were to sow. The world is be converted by it. And if this ook was true enough for Christ it is ue enough for every Christian; and is true enough for me.

Seventh, it has power to save.

In every heart, down below all other wants and aspirations, there is a profound longing to know the way of spiritual life. The world is crying, "What shall I do to be saved?" Of all books the Bible is the only one that answers that universal cry. There are others that set forth morality with more or less correctness; but there is none that suggests a blotting out of the record of the mislived past or an escape from the penalty of the broken law. There are other books that have poetry; but there is none that sings the song of salvation or gives a troubled soul the peace that floweth like a river. There are other books that have eloquence; but there is no other that enables us to behold God himself with outstretched hands pleading with men to turn and live. There are other books that have science, but there is no other that can give the soul a definite assurance of the future life, so that it can say, "I know whom I have believed; and I am persuaded that he is able to keep that which I have committed unto him against that day!"

I believe the Bible because "it finds me." Those are the words of Coleridge; and I make them mine. The Bible found me on a memorable day more than fifty years ago. It found me perplexed with a boy's fear of the unknown. It calmed my fears and gave me the hope that maketh not ashamed. It has found me once and again in the Vale of Baca and wiped away my tears. It has found me and upheld me in seasons of weakness and discouragement. It has found and never failed me. And, when I come to the border line between time and eternity, it shall find me there, and give me a rod and staff to lean on. Oh, blessed Book. The Bible is a book to live by and to die by. It is worthy to be received as an infallible rule of faith and practice. It is true and trustworthy every way. It is the veritable Word of God.

The Wickedness of Pride*

Sunday School Lesson by Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

KING UZZIAH was of illustrious descent, being ninth in line from King David. Uzziah was crowned king of Judah at sixteen years of age. He was made up of good and evil; good from David, Solomon, Asa and Jehoshaphat; bad from Rehoboam, very bad from his father Amaziah, who forsook God and set up idols, but worst of all from his great-grandmother Athaliah. But Uzziah did make progress against the evil that was born in him; the secret of his success is to be found in the statement that Uzziah was "marvelously helped of the Lord until he was exceeding strong" (II. Chron. 26: 8, 15). How was he "strong"? He owned vast herds of cattle; he possessed many vineyards; he dug many wells (a great benefaction in the Orient); he formed a great army. He fortified Jerusalem by building towers at the city gates, and on the wall. He mounted on the walls catapults for hurling large stones and engines for shooting immense arrows, for such were the munitions of war in those days. Surely King Uzziah was great in being a man of comprehensive mind.

We have all been told of a tower that was built so high that it toppled over; and Uzziah rose so high in his own estimation that he had a downfall. He dared to venture higher than God helped him, he essayed to offer sacrifice in the temple. He entered into the holy place of the sacred edifice to burn incense upon the golden altar. Azariah, the high priest, saw him unlawfully entering the temple, and took with him eighty priests to prevent the sacrilege. But Uzziah would not yield until God smote him with leprosy in the forehead, as if to rebuke his proud thoughts.

Then Uzziah left the temple, and went to live in a house by himself, for a leper might not live with others, not even his family, in any house; and there alone he died, after having been king for fifty-two years. "Pride goeth before destruction, and a haughty spirit before a fall."

Some one has said: "As chessmen are all thrown into the bag together, so in the grave there is no distinction; skulls wear no wreaths, and corpses carry no marks of honor." But this is not true; in fact, no one goes into his grave without carrying his distinction with him, whether for good or evil. Sometimes tombstones, and even monuments, are raised that tell quite a different story from what is really known concerning those who lie beneath them; while on the other hand no monuments can be made beautiful enough to picture all of the good that is remembered of those who have spent their lives serving God and humanity.

Too Good an Opinion of Himself

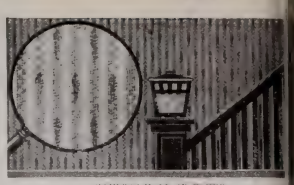
That was Uzziah's fatal fault. He should have had somebody to "take him down," as we say in not classical English. That is what the high priest tried to do, but he arrived too late. It is to be regretted that Uzziah did not have a visitor like that described in the following incident:

Mr. Alison was an attaché of the British Embassy at Constantinople. An insolent, proud Turk named Raouf Pasha was the Sultan's chief minister. When Mr. Alison had occasion to transact business at the Porte (the palace of the Sultan) he called and was announced as "Secretary of the British Embassy." Raouf Pasha took no notice of him. Seeing what the cue was—contempt for a subordinate rank—the visitor followed it in his own way. He put his hands in his pockets, whistled and stared about him. Up ran a scandalized servant to say that it was the Grand Vizier who was sitting on the sofa. "Impossible," said Mr. Alison; "that must be some flunky. The Grand Vizier would receive me like a gentleman." This brought the haughty old Mussulman to his feet. Now it was Alison's turn. Quick as thought he sat down, and patronizingly suggested that his antagonist should also seat himself. Half stupified, he did so. The business was entered upon, but Raouf had a resource of insult yet remaining. He got up, looked at the time, said it was his hour of prayer, and proceeded to cry aloud against all infidels. Then he came back to his seat, imagining perhaps that his dignity had been saved. Then Alison glanced at his watch, and declared that it was his prayer time, and promptly went aside, and in Arabic, well understood by the Pasha, he prayed with such force and sincerity that even the unbelieving Turk was impressed and accorded him the courtesy due the department he represented. What the reflections of the Grand Vizier were we may not even guess, but it is evident that his pride had been humbled. If some one had done a similar service for King Uzziah he might have been saved from his sad fate.

We are reminded of King Nebuchadnezzar, who had also too good an opinion of himself, and whose pride was the occasion of his fall. His Maker had endued him with powers that made it possible for him to establish a great name, and build the wonderful city of Babylon. But he looked upon all the grandeur about him, and exclaimed: "Is not this great Babylon that I have built for the house of the kingdom by the might of my power, and for the honor of my majesty?" (Dan. 4: 30.) God heard, but did not touch his lips with leprosy; but there fell a voice from heaven, saying: "Thy kingdom is departed from thee. And they shall drive thee from men, and thy dwelling shall be with the beasts of the field," etc. And it was so. Nebuchadnezzar was driven from men, and "did eat grass as oxen, and his body was wet with the dew of heaven, till his hairs were grown like eagle's feathers, and his nails like bird's claws" (Dan. 4: 33). What was it but Nebuchadnezzar's pride become insanity? But out of it all there came blessing for Nebuchadnezzar; for he made confession after many days: "I lifted up mine eyes unto heaven, and mine understanding returned unto me, and I blessed the Most High, and I praised and honored him that liveth forever."

Alas! Uzziah did not repent of his pride, and he died a leper!

God's Estimate of Pride



"These six things doth the Lord hate; yea, seven are an abomination unto him: a proud look, a lying tongue, and hands that shed innocent blood, a heart that deviseth wicked imaginations, feet that be swift in running to mischief, a false witness that speaketh lies, and he that soweth discord among brethren" (Prov. 6: 16-19). The proud are thus classed with the most wicked people on earth, with liars, murderers, instigators of crime, perjurers and scandal-mongers. How alarmed then should be those who have this heart disease of pride!

"Him that hath a high look and a proud heart will not I suffer" (Ps. 101: 5).

"Every one that is proud in heart is an abomination to the Lord; though hand join in hand, he shall not be unpunished" (Prov. 16: 5).

"God resisteth the proud, but giveth grace unto the humble" (Jas. 4: 6).

Pride vs. Humility

The flaunting sin of pride has its antithesis in the virtue of humility. We will compare pride with the self-asserting, stiff sunflower; humility, with the modest violet, almost hidden by its leaves, but making us aware of its presence by the sweet fragrance which it sends forth. The sunflowers are seen from afar, but very few of them are gathered by loving hands. They grow in isolation, and go to seed, while the dear little violets are eagerly sought and gathered into dainty bunches, to be worn by lovers of flowers, or sent to cheer and delight the sick.

King Uzziah was a sunflower man. He was high above other men in his abundance of gold and treasure. He has been compared with King Solomon in such matters. What is the end of the sunflower? The head grows so heavy that it drops down upon the stalk. Something like this happened to King Uzziah; he became so filled with pride that he was smitten by leprosy in the head, and the closing part of his life was like a living death.

There is a man of whom we like to read in the Bible, who is to be compared with the modest, sweet violet. He is the writer of one of the Gospels, but strangely enough he never mentions his own name, but calls himself the disciple whom Jesus loved." The place where he loved best to be was leaning on Jesus' bosom. And when Jesus came to the hour of his death, this was the man to whose loving care he consigned his sorrow-smitten mother. John was his name, the same to the end of his long life, for he lived to be nearly, if not quite, one hundred years old; and when a prisoner on the lonely isle of Patmos, where he could not console and inspire and help men by his voice, he wrote words which ever since have been among the greatest treasures of the Christian world.

Humility is the softening shadow before the statue of Excellence,
And lieth lowly on the ground, beloved and lovely as the violet;
Humility is the fair-haired maid that calleth
Worth her brother;
The gentle nurse that fostereth infant virtues;
Humility bringeth no excuse; she is welcome to God and man;
Her countenance is needful unto all who would prosper in either world;
And the mild light of her sweet face is mirrored in the eyes of her companions,
And straightway stand they accepted, children of penitence and love. TUPPER.

A Hint for Primary Teachers

Begin the lesson with the illustration of the sunflower and the violet. If the flowers are not obtainable, they can be drawn upon the blackboard. Tell the story of King Uzziah, and close with the story of John, the beloved disciple. Do not try to make what some teachers call an "application" (it would not be according to good psychology). The children will do that for themselves if the teacher has reached their inner consciousness, and more than likely some child will say, "I want to be like a violet," and others will say "So do I, so do I," and all will feel the same way. Try to leave upon their minds the blessedness of humility, rather than the scorching, withering impression of the wickedness of pride.

Among the Workers

—CHAPLAIN FRANK M. WELLS, evangelist of Jackson, Tenn., is having great success in Texas. Many have professed faith in Christ at his meetings.

—THE UNION evangelistic meetings under the leadership of Evangelist Shannon, held at Madera, Calif., have come to a close. Business men were among the converts. The saloon is likely to be voted out in that township.

—A CAMPAIGN in behalf of the sick babies of New York will be conducted during the coming summer by the New York Diet Kitchen Association, which now has nine diet kitchens in operation and supplies certified milk for thousands of babies daily. A doctor and nurse have been assigned to each of the nine kitchens.

—A REVIVAL in Northern New York, in which Wolcott and Red Creek were engaged, closed March 21 with a rally service at Wolcott. Professions of conversion numbered 644, and about 35 who were professed Christians, but not church members, decided to unite with churches. Among the converts was an editor, a leading lawyer, a practising physician, two brothers (noted infidels), a singing teacher, merchants, butchers, mechanics and farmers. Over one hundred packs of playing cards were burned after Evangelist Crabill's sermon on "Questionable Amusements."

—THE PAST YEAR has been one of remarkable activity in evangelistic work in St. John, N. B., Canada. Under the leadership of sixteen evangelists, meetings were held in six churches and the city hall. Some months later Herbert Booth conducted services in the North End Baptist church, and immediately after this a Laymen's Mission was held in the Queen's Rink by Dr. Torrey, and a mammoth choir led by William McEwan. At the conclusion of the Torrey meetings a number of those who had been converted organized a mission for men, which is being held every Sunday night in the Unique Theatre under the auspices of the Young Men's Christian Association, and already a number of conversions have resulted.

—CELEBRATING THE ninety-first anniversary of her birth on March 24, Miss Fanny Crosby, the famous blind hymn writer, spoke in response to a toast at a party in the home of Dr. E. S. Smith at Bridgeport, Conn. She said: "Friends, the angel of the hour is holding to my lips a chalice so full of blessings that I am lost in its infinity. As I listen he reminds me that twelve golden months have borne to the divine Author of my being the record of another year. Think of it, the record of another year! The Lord has done great things for me. He has preserved my health, my strength, my intellect. He has renewed the vigor of my youth. I ought to be the happiest mortal in the world, and I guess I am. Nothing troubles me. I praise the Lord for all that is past and, praise his name, I can trust him for all that is to come."

Justice for the Advertiser

SOME time ago one of our subscribers ordered some goods of one of our advertisers, and the goods not proving satisfactory, the subscriber complained to us. We wrote the advertiser, who after some delay requested the subscriber to send back the goods. This was done, and the subscriber received a check for the amount, twelve dollars, which he had paid the advertiser.

Now he complains that he has not only lost forty-five cents expressage and postage, but has "lost confidence in the great humbug of advertising, and the honesty of the greedy for gain."

Now it seems to us that this subscriber should have the very opposite opinion of advertisers and advertising. Not only did the advertiser in question prove himself no "humbug," but the fact that he returned the full amount paid by our subscriber shows that he was not one of those who are "greedy for gain." If the subscriber lost his time the advertiser lost much more, and as for the expressage, we are remitting the amount of this to our subscriber, so that he will not have the slightest cause for feeling that any advertiser in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is other than he is represented to be.

Whenever any of our subscribers is defrauded by an advertiser in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD we will make good the claim, provided that the subscriber, who must be of record, has mentioned THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in writing to the advertiser, and provided the claim is made to us within two months of the date of the appearance of the advertisement. This guarantee does not apply to investment advertisements.

TO GET A WATCH that will keep time as well as the Ingersoll-Trenton, you must buy an Ingersoll-Trenton—or pay more.

There is no other watch at the price of the Ingersoll-Trenton—$5.00 to $19.00—which will keep as good time. There is no watch at any price that will keep more than a very small fraction better time.

To get that infinitely small fraction of accuracy makes your watch cost ten times as much as the Ingersoll-Trenton—and that small fraction is not really of value in the day's work. In other words, an Ingersoll-Trenton at, say $9.00, is a good enough watch for anybody. Sold only by responsible jewelers.

BONDS AND BONDS

RECENT revelations concerning the methods of get-rich-quick swindlers indicate that there is perhaps no class of educated men more persistently preyed upon by financial pirates than are the clergy. It may be because ministers are supposed to be lacking in that business sense that animates the life of the average man, but certain it is that the preacher who suddenly comes into a little money is almost certain to be the recipient of many invitations through the mails to take advantage of "business propositions" that will surely produce "snug sums," "tidy sums," and even "competencies," if he invest in them at once, as "this unrivaled offer is only open for a week." And, sad to relate, these men are, in this way, too often robbed of the few dollars spared from their own pressing needs. Here is a true story with a moral:

A Minister's Experience

Mr. S., a young man, with a young wife and child, was pastor of a large but poor congregation in central New York. He was not particularly elated when he came into possession of something over fifty thousand dollars. It was not a sudden nor an unexpected fortune, for he had known, since he was old enough to give any thought to the matter, that he and his sister were the sole heirs of their father, who was a widower and had been a successful stock-raiser. Now that the property was sold and the proceeds divided between himself and his sister, the young clergyman was not a little perplexed to know what to do with his money; but he was very certain that it should be invested in a way that would bring in the largest returns consistent with safety.

Mr. S. himself was quite sure he needed advice, and, as became a good husband, he first sought it from his wife, who modestly declined, in view of her own inexperience; but she begged him before doing anything to consult with Mr. D., a banker in the neighboring city, and an old friend of her own family.

"I am very sure," said Mr. D. with a smile, after the young clergyman had stated the purpose of his visit, "that you have already had a lot of advice on this subject, some of it no doubt good, and most of it unselfish; but I cannot say what I should do, if in your position."

A Banker's Advice

After explaining that security was the first thing to be considered, Mr. D. went on to show that the greater the security the smaller the returns. "But," he added, "there are many opportunities to get from four to six per cent. on a safe investment, such as this bank has frequently to make in order to get a fair return from its surplus cash. Now, if I had fifty thousand dollars to spare, and wished to make it revenue-producing, I should invest it in good notes secured by a mortgage, or in bonds secured by mortgages on approved realty, and paying from five to six per cent. semi-annually. If I could not find suitable mortgages in my own town, I should place my money in the hands of responsible parties who make a business of mortgage investments in other cities. In the latter case I might not be able to count on more than five per cent.; but that would mean twenty-five hundred dollars a year, or three times your present income. One-half of that should be reinvested, the other half used for improved living and books, and a few hundred for charity."

"I am glad you mentioned charity," responded Mr. S.; "for I find the most trying part of my calling is my inability to meet the incessant demands of the very poor in my neighborhood. My increased ability to relieve these wants has been to me the greatest blessing of my inheritance from father's estate. And so the greater my income the more I shall have to spend in good work."

"Very true; but is it not better to have a smaller, certain amount for that purpose than a larger one that is uncertain?" asked Mr. D., now quite sure that the proposed five per cent. did not appeal to his visitor as he had hoped.

On further questioning Mr. D. learned that his brother, who was promoting a new branch railroad from one of the trunk lines to a port on Lake Ontario, had been to see the young clergyman.

"My brother is young, energetic, and I am sure honest in all his intentions," said Mr. D.; "but he is an enthusiast, and such men are apt to make mistakes. I suppose he wants you to buy bonds of the new line they propose to build. Well, good approved railroad bonds paying five per cent. are a first rate investment."

"But," interposed Mr. S., "the bonds of the new line will pay six per cent. More than that, if I buy two bonds I shall be entitled to two shares of stock, which within a few years will be paying, it is confidently believed, eight or ten per cent. of their face. Then, too, I shall be entitled to a lot of bonds, equivalent to half the amount of my purchase, and bearing the same interest. They will indeed be the same six per cent. bonds, except that the coupons will be cut off for four years, after which they will be paid semi-annually. Now, even if the stock pays only six per cent., my investment, after a few years, will be returning fifteen per cent., or three times what you propose."

A Theoretical Financier

"Why," laughed Mr. D., "you are already a theoretical financier. But let us examine this enterprise. There are good men behind it, though I haven't much faith in the promoter who secured the charter and makes that his contribution. It will be three years before the road earns the interest on its first bonds; meanwhile that interest must be met by the sale of more bonds. My bank has been invited in, but we stay out. That is all I can say, except this: Before you do anything else, buy a paid-up life insurance policy for ten thousand dollars, payable to your wife."

Mr. S. took the banker's advice as to the life policy, but, after further consultation with his wife, he invested nearly all his remaining money in the new branch road that promised so much, and which the trunk line would be compelled to take over before it was completed.

Three years passed, up to which time the bond interest had been met. Then the interest stopped; so did work on the uncompleted road. The trunk line bought the property by assuming one-third of the actual bonded indebtedness. The original investors, after all liens were met, got just one and a half per cent. of the money they had put in.

As a matter of fact the big-interest bait which is held out to the investor, proves too often to be all too tempting. Again and again we see reiterated the axiom that the larger the interest the greater the risk, and yet it seems that people who are so-called hard-headed in other business transactions, are continually fooled by the "sharper" who promises them fabulous returns. This very argument is often used by the financial pirate to gild his promises with such examples as American Bell Telephone, Standard Oil, etc. But the possibility of the ordinary investor ever striking one of these bonanzas in its infancy is too remote for consideration. It all comes back to the old warning which we have repeated again and again in these columns—Be sure of your banker and don't expect too much for your money.

Do You Want a Long Row of Elegant Leather Cases?

They cost a small fortune, and shut up in them, away from the live, busy world, is all the rich knowledge of the ages.

Big publishers have spent millions of dollars on the big, handsome and terribly expensive Encyclopedias in a score or more volumes, and have boasted of their achievements for the welfare of mankind. Wealthy library owners have bought the great sets of costly leather volumes and have set them up in their sectional bookcases or mahogany cabinets to be admired and protected from the dust.

Use them, my boy—for the practical, everyday work of school or business or household? My goodness—no! They would get worn and scratched and the leaves torn! They cost more than a hundred dollars! Some class—what? You may look at them, but handle gently.

WELL, WHERE DO YOU AND I COME IN?

Where do the busy men and women of moderate means—who want the knowledge but not the costly cases—come in?

And the school boys and girls, and working boys and girls, whose daily or evening study requirements and whose thirst for information must be met around the fireside at home—where do they come in?

CHRISTIAN HERALD families, who want the real substance of knowledge and not the show—where do they come in?

HERE IS THE ANSWER TO 4020 CHRISTIAN HERALD FAMILIES!

To CHRISTIAN HERALD READERS:

The barrier of price has been broken down! The need of a great, complete, reliable and usable Encyclopedia in the family may be met at once almost without cost.

Instead of offering you somebody's American or British hundred-dollar Encyclopedia, which perhaps you can not afford to buy, and which you might be afraid to use if you had it, we have rubbed Aladdin's lamp, and will place in your home the great 12-volume World-Wide Encyclopedia for just about one-tenth the lowest price of other big Encyclopedias—and only $1.00 to pay now.

We can't let every CHRISTIAN HERALD family have this remarkable bargain. Sorry, but we are compelled to limit the number to 4020 sets. Those who get their orders in first will have these sets at the surprisingly little price of $11.75 each—$1.00 with order and $1.00 a month thereafter. (The regular price for the cheapest binding would be $30.00.)

The World-Wide Encyclopedia contains the important facts of all knowledge, from the earliest times of the world up to President Taft's administration. It sweeps every field of human enterprise, faithfully records all recent discoveries, traces the mental and moral development of the race, the growth of nations, their governments and their commerce and manufacture. It is a rich treasure-store of History, Geography, Industry, Science, Art, Biography and Literature. It is a sure authority on all subjects, and has the imprint and endorsement of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD as a guarantee of a superior excellence and complete reliability.

The World-Wide Encyclopedia is in 12 large octavo volumes, containing 9807 pages and 96 maps. It is durably bound in heavy silk-finished cloth, with gold stamps. The set stands 9 inches high and fills 26 inches of shelf space.

The fact that only $1.00 need be paid before the entire set is shipped, and then only $1.00 a month, makes it possible for families that really need a complete, reliable Encyclopedia, but cannot spend a fortune for one, to get possession at once of this splendid World-Wide Encyclopedia.

We fully guarantee every set. If you are not entirely pleased in every particular, you may return the Encyclopedia within ten days and get your money back.

Really, this is a wonderful bargain. We are glad of the chance to give CHRISTIAN HERALD subscribers such a valuable Encyclopedia and save them so much money. We wish we could supply every family on our list, but this time we are compelled to limit the offer to 4020 sets at so great a discount.

Send at once this Coupon with the first $1.00, and the World-Wide Encyclopedia will be boxed and shipped to you promptly, freight charges payable at your end.

Honoring Our Profession*

A CHRISTIAN woman was one day trying to defend a fellow church-member, who had been accused of giving way to fits of anger.

"He is a good man," she insisted, "but somehow he does not understand that being a Christian means that he must keep his temper."

Thus many others among us act as though, if we were careful, as the witty old poet said, to avoid the sins that we "have no mind to," we might be excused if we commit those that we are "inclined to."

"It tires me so," complained a girl to her mother," to have you keep telling me that I must do everything in the very best way I can, every day."

Yet that is the only way to live one's life as a Christian should. A great man has said that no virtue is securely possessed until it has become a habit. The habit of duty, duty in the home—duty in business—duty in the church—duty in public life, must become a habit. Then, and then only, does it cease to be hard and burdensome. But remember that it is never impossible. If the finger of God, through his servant Conscience, bids us follow a special path, it can always be done, no matter how thorn-strewn and difficult it may appear.

The thrilling lines of Emerson upon this subject always come to mind when it is under discussion. Commit the exact words to memory:

> So nigh is grandeur to our dust,
> So near is God to man,
> When Duty whispers low, "Thou must,"
> The youth replies, "I can."

One of the chief duties which falls to the lot of every Christian is to try to win souls for the Master. He must try to win them among his business associates and among the public generally, but his first efforts should be put forth in his home.

Dr. J. Wilbur Chapman says that a man went to a friend of his and remarked, "I have about decided to enter upon evangelistic work, and want a few suggestions from you. I am going to California and am sure that with such a class as I shall find there, I shall be successful."

His friend said, "Do you live here?"

"Yes, with my brother and sisters."

"Is your brother a Christian?"

"No, he is not. The fact is, I have never asked him."

"May I inquire if your sisters are Christians?"

"No. As a matter of fact, we are not on very good terms with each other, and I know little about their spiritual condition."

The friends turned on him sharply and said, "God will never use you in the broader work, sir, until you are successful in your home field."

Duty begins at home. So far as your own efforts can secure it, see that happiness, peace and true religion reign there every day.

The idea of Christian unity is often emphasized by Paul as a Christian duty. In his day, even as now, there were apparently many contrary and quarrelsome men. Nearly all of us have encountered such characters, who are likely to be against whatever measure is proposed by others. Whether this is the result of temperament, wrong training, mental stupidity or pure malice, one can never tell; but if you find yourself beset by this most unamiable and trying tendency, fight it to the death. It is the chief cause of divisions in families, and feuds in the church; and is a prime factor in the slowness of Christianity's progress.

Let us have unity among Christians, "One mind, striving together for the faith of the Gospel."

Great Lives: Ruth*

THE idyl of Ruth is considered by many critics the most poetic and beautiful among all of the ancient writings. Her devotion to her mother-in-law, a devotion exceptional, according to all history and literature; her faithful industry; and her generous disposition show her to have been a young woman of exalted character.

"All the city of my people," said Boaz, "doth know that thou art a virtuous woman."

Horton's supposition that she was not possessed of remarkable beauty is not shared by most readers. It is true that she was sufficiently lovely in character to dispense with any further charm; yet all of the poets who have written of her have seemed to read between the lines of her touching story, that face and manner illustrated fittingly her inner graces. Thomas Hood, in his famous lines upon her, conceives her to look like "a sweetheart of the sun," brown, with cheeks like red poppies, a "tressy" forehead, long lashes, and "praising God with sweetest looks."

The ancient chronicler has wisely omitted any reference to these characteristics, if such there were. He was evidently captivated by her lofty virtues, and was determined to focus upon them the attention of the reader. It is well that a woman who was to become the mother of a lordly line should possess a full measure of the great qualities, and this had evidently been granted to Ruth the Moabitess.

The date and authorship of this book are unknown, though it is generally attributed to Samuel.

It was surely written as late as the establishment of the house of David (see Ruth 4: 22), unless the last verses of the book were added by later writers, which is not likely.

The ancient Jews annexed the book of Ruth to that of Judges; but the modern Jews place directly after the Pentateuch, the five Megilloth: 1, The Song of Solomon; 2, Ruth; 3, Lamentations; 4, Ecclesiastes; 5, Esther.

In the minds of men the vision of Ruth stands first and foremost for loyalty. Her eloquent vow of fealty to the bereft Naomi has come to stand among the immortal sayings of all literature. Choirs chant it; preachers quote it; poets weave it into their verses; and never does it fail to thrill every hearer and reader with its nobility.

For loyalty to the highest and best is at bottom the basis of all character. He who is true to an earthly friend is likely to be true to his Maker. He who regards God's wishes unwaveringly may be relied upon to remain faithful to every worldly obligation.

The necessity of having one's inner life right is well demonstrated by Ruth. How little she thought that her loving loyalty was to be made immortal and was to be incorporated into the sacred books, to ring with divine melody far down the ages, and inspire all mankind to greater truth and more unselfish love! With no intention on her part to produce an "effect," but simply out of the depths of a tender and sincere heart, sprang her beautiful deed, unconsciously and unaffectedly. Hence her conduct was right.

The friendship of David, Ruth's great descendant, for Jonathan, was like that of hers for Naomi. So was Paul's for Timothy. So was that of our Saviour for the beloved disciple.

There is nothing more lovely in life than this sweet and unswerving loyalty of one noble soul to another. It uplifts not only those who share it but all who behold it.

DAME NATURE HINTS

When the Food Is Not Suited.

When Nature gives her signal that something is wrong it is generally with the food; the old Dame is always faithful and one should act at once.

To put off the change is to risk that which may be irreparable. An Arizona man says:

"For years I could not safely eat any breakfast. I tried all kinds of breakfast foods, but they were all soft, starchy messes, which gave me distressing headaches. I drank strong coffee, too, which appeared to benefit me at the time, but added to the headaches afterwards. Toast and coffee were no better, for I found the toast very constipating.

"A friend persuaded me to quit coffee and the starchy breakfast foods, and use Postum and Grape-Nuts instead. I shall never regret taking his advice.

"The change they have worked in me is wonderful. I now have no more of the distressing sensations in my stomach after eating, and I never have any headaches. I have gained 12 pounds in weight and feel better in every way. Grape-Nuts make a delicious as well as a nutritious dish, and I find that Postum is easily digested and never produces dyspepsia symptoms."

THE SILENT MARCH

WHEN the march begins in the morning
And the heart and the foot are light,
When the flags are all a-flutter
And the world is gay and bright,
When the bugles lead the column
And the drums are proud in the van,
It's shoulder to shoulder, forward, march!
Ah! let him lag who can.

For it's easy to march to music
With your comrades all in line,
And you don't get tired, you feel inspired,
And life is a draught divine.

When the march drags on at evening
And the color-bearer's gone,
When the merry strains are silent
That piped so brave in the dawn,
When you miss the dear old fellows
Who started out with you,
When it's stubborn and sturdy, forward, march!
Though the ragged lines are few.

Then it's hard to march in silence,
And the road has lonesome grown,
And life is a bitter cup to drink;
But the soldier must not moan.

And this is the task before us,
A task we may never shirk,
In the gay time and the sorrowful time
We must march and do our work.
We must march when the music cheers us,
March when the strains are dumb,
Plucky and valiant, forward, march!
And smile whatever may come.

For whether life's hard or easy,
The strong man keeps the pace,
For the desolate march and the silent
The strong soul finds the grace.

A Musical Prodigy

THERE is a little French girl musician whose name is Yvonne Borderon, only seven years of age, who is a marvel because of her infallible recognition of the pitch of notes. Her ability in this direction was first shown when a cat in attempting to crawl upon the piano touched a key with her paw. Yvonne exclaimed, "F sharp," and so it was. A drinking glass was struck, and she said, "G flat." She quickly interpreted an automobile horn, a cyclist's gong, a locomotive whistle, a church bell, etc. One day her father pulled the lowest string of a double bass viol, and she exclaimed, "D flat." It was thought she had made a mistake, because that string is ordinarily E; but when the viol and piano were compared it was found that the viol was out of tune, and Yvonne was right. One day Yvonne's mother tried to play a trick on her, and she struck a C sharp on the piano, calling out "G." Yvonne walked up with a frown, and said to her reproachfully, "Mother dear, it is not well to lie." Not to call the note by its right name was, in her estimation, to do violence to the truth.

Questions and Answers

A. B. C., Hebron, Va. 1. How many States have woman suffrage? 2. Has Rhode Island still two capitals? 3. Where can I obtain copies of the Constitutions of the different States? 4. How many miles of railway did Alaska have in 1909?

1. Five—Utah, Wyoming, Idaho, Colorado, Washington. 2. No. Providence is now its sole capital. 3. Write to the Secretary of State of each State. 4. Approximately 303 miles.

E. S., Easton, Pa. 1. What proof have we that Jesus will reign over this world one thousand years after his second coming to earth? 2. Do the dead saints now hover over God's people to help them in their need, as some say it means in Heb. 1: 14 and Ps. 34: 7?

1. There are many things which though incapable of proof in the human legal sense are yet capable of demonstration to the spiritual sense. The belief in the millennium (see Rev. 20: 1 to 7) is not based upon a single passage. It has been consistently held ever since the beginning of the Christian era by a very considerable portion of the Church. The Jews also had visions of it, and the evidence of their belief is seen in some of their sacred writings (see Isa. 65: 17, etc.). Many Christian millennarians attach a literal interpretation to Christ's sayings in Matt. 26: 29, Mark 14: 25, and also interpret John 6: 39, 44; Luke 20: 35, Luke 14: 14, Matt. 19: 28 and other related passages as strengthening the millennarian view. 2. Paul says in Heb. 12: 1: "We also are compassed about by a cloud of witnesses." These were interested yet unseen spectators, redeemed ones, who had themselves been in the same contest, and the knowledge of whose spiritual presence gives encouragement. The passages in Heb. 1: 14 and Ps. 34: 7 refer to angels only.

Mrs. W., Savannah, Ga. Lately I heard an evangelist say that "Felix might have given Paul a different answer ('Go thy way for this time, and when I have a convenient season I will call thee unto me'), but he was afraid of Drusilla, the woman at his side, who was not his wife." In Acts' 24: 24 I read she was his wife.

Drusilla (Josephus informs us) was the wife of Azizus, King of Edessa, but Felix induced her to leave her husband and on being divorced she married Felix. Tacitus, the historian, affirms this, but gives such a different account of her parentage that some have conjectured that Felix married two Drusillas in succession. Possibly the preacher meant that she had become the wife of Felix by unlawful means.

A young reader of this paper in Romero, Texas, sends this dainty little verse, which contains a sentiment worth remembering:

"Little brown sister far over the sea,
Here is some money my father gave me.
'Tis more than I need now, that's why I declare
The belief that he gave me a part of your share.
And when he gives me more than I use
May I not share with you, if I choose?
He gave it, I think (for my wants are supplied),
To teach me how blessed it is to divide."

E. F. C., Ellenville, N. Y. We brought up the question in our Sunday School class, "What should be the proper observance of the Sabbath?" Our teacher did not seem quite satisfied with the class's opinion. I know what the Bible says, but what we want is something more simplified or explicit, so that we can apply it to our own lives. Should a farmer milk his cows on Sunday?

The commandment is very clear with regard to Sabbath observance, but it is capable of fuller explanation. To keep holy or sanctify the Sabbath is to appropriate it to sacred purposes; and the purport of the commandment is that as the Sabbath properly signifies rest and leisure from servile work, and at the same time is used to denote the seventh day, which God at the beginning consecrated to holy rest, to enjoin by special precept the duty of hallowing it by a total suspension of all labor, both personal and domestic. The word "Remember" implies that it was well known as a consecrated. The commandment even specifies that not only we ourselves, with our dependents, but even our beasts of burden, are to have the privilege of a rest on the seventh day. At the same time, it has been held during the Mosaic dispensation and since that works of necessity and mercy were permissible on the Lord's day. It should not be difficult for one with a conscience and ordinary intelligence to decide what is absolutely necessary and what is charity or mercy. Jesus himself has shown that it was necessary to eat on the Sabbath day and that it was even permissible to walk through the fields, and he did not condemn the plucking of the ears of grain. He told us also that when an animal fell into a pit on the Sabbath it would be permissible and proper to take it out. That was mercy. He visited on the Sabbath, and at the same time he set us an example to make it as far as possible a day of complete abstention from routine tasks or duties. We have heard of preachers who have stopped in the middle of their sermons and ordered the congregation to go out and take in Widow Jones' hay and save it from destruction by an impending rain or hail-storm. That, though an extreme case, was a work of necessity and of charity also. You ask about milking cows. Certainly that is a work of necessity, but the commercial end of the transaction can well be deferred till next day. Many people get their Sunday milk supply on Saturday. We do not honor God by making of his day a straight-laced, stiff, pharisaical observance, but by spending the day to his glory and the welfare of our fellowmen, as well as to the rest and recreation of our own bodies. Of course, one of the first duties is to worship in his temple, and this should be invariably observed, whether the temple be a splendid church or a simple room in which two or three gather together in his name.

Subscriber, Savannah, Ga. Where will I find the origin of (1) "A fool and his money are soon parted" and (2) "Fight the devil with fire"?

1. It is said to have originated with a king's jester, as the last line of a couplet which he was given to rhyme. There may be some connection between the phrase and "a fool's bolt is soon shot," in Shakespeare's Henry V. 2. Origin unknown.

A. F., Galveston, Texas. How am I, in a dilemma, to know the will of God? It is about a certain change of position.

It is never the will of God that we should act selfishly, or evade our just obligations, or neglect our proper duties. One's present sphere is the place God appoints for him in the meantime and if we are there, doing our duty, God's call to a change will find us equipped and ready. Of course, you are entirely right in the desire to advance to larger opportunities and greater responsibilities by every honorable means; but such a call only comes to those who are doing their present work well. To any others, the call would be meaningless. On the other hand, if acceptance would involve the sacrifice of those dependent upon you, or if conscience and a sense of duty tell you to stay, you will lose nothing by rejecting the temptation. Depend upon it, when God calls, he not only opens the way but clears off all the obstacles to honorable acceptance. Have faith in God, and his guidance and be true to Christian principle and you will not make a mistake.

S. McK., Bryan, O. Please explain Matt. 7: 6 and the first clause of I. Cor. 6: 20.

1. Here Jesus was using a familiar illustration. In the East the dogs are the scavengers and swine are ceremonially unclean. It means that religion is brought into contempt and its professors insulted when it is forced upon those who cannot value it and will not have it. It is not intended, however, that there should be no effort made to evangelize those who are leading vile and wicked lives, but simply as a caution against indiscriminate zeal. 2. The 19th and 20th verses must be read together as a whole. The believer's body is a temple which must be kept pure and fitting for the Holy Spirit. It is his own no longer. Christ's sacrifice was the purchase price of our salvation—the ransom paid to divine justice for our redemption. It is therefore our duty not only to glorify God with the spirit but with the body also, abstaining from all impure living, and consecrating it to his service. The whole chapter is a powerful plea for personal purity and a holy life.

W. E. H., Western, Neb. Describe aluminum, the process of manufacture, and tell where aluminum works are situated in the United States.

Aluminum is a white metal with a bluish tinge, used much in the arts. It is hard as silver, but very malleable and ductile. Next to oxygen and silica it is the chief component of the earth's crust. It is hard to isolate from the minerals in which it occurs. A young student of Oberlin College, named Hall, devised the process by which all aluminum is now manufactured. This consists in electrolysis. Hall discovered that a melted bath of the double fluorides of aluminum and metals more electropositive than aluminum, such as sodium and calcium, is a perfect solvent for alumina, taking it up as hot water does sugar, and dissolving twenty-five per cent. of its weight. The solution was found to yield promptly to electrolysis. The vessels used in making aluminum by this process are rectangular iron boxes, thickly lined with carbon, which constitutes the cathode. The anodes consist of forty cylinders of carbon, each about three inches in diameter and eighteen inches long when new. These are supported above the pot, dipping into the bath of melted fluorides. The chief aluminum works in the United States are around Kensington, Pa.

R. F. G., New York City; C. F. H., Poultney, Vt., and others. Will you kindly explain why eggs figure so conspicuously at Easter? What is the connection of the rabbit with the Easter idea?

Easter or Pasch eggs are symbolical of the creation or recreation of spring. The custom of attaching a sentiment to eggs in the spring time is Magian or Persian, and originally referred to a Persian legendary story. It also prevailed amongst the Jews, Egyptians and Hindus. Christians adopted the custom to symbolize the resurrection. The origin of the Easter rabbit is indefinite. There are several stories, all of which are too simple to be credible. The idea of a child that a rabbit seen running away from a hen's nest had laid the eggs is one of them. Others state that the rabbit is symbolic of the fertility of spring.

C. H., Siloam Springs, Ark. It is said that during the imprisonment of the Federal forces at Andersonville, when the men were suffering for water, a spring broke out at the root of a tree inside the prison, saving the lives of many. Is there any evidence that it had ever appeared before? Does it continue to flow?

Possibly some of our readers may be able to shed light on this interesting question.

M. R., Decatur, Ia. In view of the world-wide Bible celebration now going on, can you give in brief space the chronology of the various English Bible revisions since the first Anglo-Saxon version appeared?

Beginning with Caedmon, the monk, whose translation of portions of the Bible may be regarded as the first crude effort at a version in the common English of his day, they were as follows: Caedmon's history of the Old Testament in verse, Anglo-Saxon Psalter about 709, Guthlac's translation of the Psalms about 710, Bede's translation of the Lord's Prayer and Creed and also the Gospel of John about 735, Alfred the Great's translation of the Ten Commandments, Alfric's translation of the Pentateuch, Joshua, Judges, etc.; Matthew's Bible, 1551; Wycliffe's Bible, 1382; Purrey's Bible, 1388; William Tyndale, 1525; Myles Coverdale, 1535; Taverner's, 1539; Great Bible, 1539; Cranmer's Bible, 1540; Bishop's Bible, 1568; Genevan Bible, 1560-1576; Anglo-Rhenish New Testament, 1582; Douay (Catholic) Old Testament, 1609-1610; Authorized Version, 1611.

W. F., Jersey City, N. J. I have heard Hoboken called "Gretna Green." Can you tell me what this means?

Gretna Green is the name of a village in Dumfriesshire, Scotland. All the runaway couples for a radius of fifty miles or more went to this village to get married. From this it became celebrated. Doubtless Hoboken has been called a Gretna Green because of the many couples who go from New York City to be married there. No marriage license is required in the State of New Jersey.

H. P., Athens, O. Please explain Eccles. 12: 2; also verse 6.

This chapter pictures in beautiful yet simple similitudes the approach of old age. Verse 2 describes a joyless old age in which troubles follow each other and when sunshine and cheer need hardly be expected after the storm. It is an old age unillumined by piety. In verse 6, the images of the loosing of the silver cord and the breaking of the golden bowl and the pitcher all represent the approach of death. In the East the frail lamp was usually gilded over and hung by a silken cord with strands of silver interwoven, which, when snapped and broken, represented the breaking of human life. The golden (gilded) bowl of the lamp symbolized the skull and the silver cord the spinal marrow, white and precious, attached to the brain. The figure of the broken pitcher and wheel typify the time when life ceases and the vital energies are gone; when no longer the fountain (the heart) forces the blood through the veins.

M. A. L. sends this description of a very satisfactory device for an invalid chair which automatically fans the sitter: "In one end of a reed, I cut a grove in the top and some notches near each end, and tied it to the upright of a rocking chair, on the side of the chair next to the bed. I took another long reed to go as far across the bed as I might wish and cut three notches in it. I basted cloth on one side, fastening at notches to keep in position. Then I placed this reed in the groove on top of the reed fastened to the chair, and tied it with strings I had tied in the notches of the first reed. I fastened a string in the notches of the reed with the cloth on it, and then tied this string to the other side of the rocking chair. The height of the fan above the sick person may be regulated by this string. The doctor said it was a decided success. The nurse can then fan the patient by rocking."

Reader, St. Albans, Vt. We pay no attention to chain letters. The one you sent is a fair sample of many of the same kind.

Mrs. S. G. K., Malvern, Pa. The sufferers in China are chiefly small peasant farmers and laborers in the agricultural districts. Although no doubt there is some suffering among the Christian natives, these would be about the first to be relieved.

Mrs. J. H. C., Seymour, Ind. There is no Scriptural evidence of any previous incarnation of Christ before his birth in Bethlehem of Judea. Some speculative commentators have suggested that Melchizedek was such an incarnation, but the suggestion cannot be sustained.

Mrs. D. A. T., Columbia, S. C. 1. The Sunday School Lessons are published ahead of time in order to permit of their being studied before they are taken up in class. 2. See recent paragraph in THE MAIL-BAG regarding the Creation. 3. The disciple referred to was doubtless John himself.

J. H. H., Gordon, Neb. 1. Paying respect to the memory of a person by the erection of a statue, is not worship in the proper sense of the term. 2. Moab, Ammon, Edom and Philistia as nations have long since disappeared. It would be difficult now to trace the descendants of any of these, except perhaps the Moabites.

A. C. T., Cuba. There is no union of church and State in this republic. All sects and denominations stand on the same level and are entitled to the same privileges. There is no one among them which has "official recognition" in preference to the others. All denominations are represented in the Cabinet and in Congress.

E. W. S., Northfield, Minn. 1. Marriages between first cousins are discouraged because of the consanguineous relationship. The offspring of such union is apt to be intellectually feeble and physically degenerate. 2. Dancing, while it may be harmless in itself, leads to promiscuous acquaintanceships that are a peril to young people and should be avoided. Write to the National Temperance Society, New York City, for literature on liquors and tobacco.

R. L. L., Scottsburg, Va. What is needed is not the abolition but the regulation of immigration. You should not forget that the country has been largely built up by immigration. Restriction of numbers, an educational and financial qualification, exclusion of the criminal, the insane, the pauper and the defective—these are some of the reforms needed. Most of them, though already provided for by law, are not in actual operation.

Several readers have taken exception to the statement recently made in this column as to the origin of the affirmation, as allowed in place of the oath. Attention is called to the use of the affirmation by the Quakers and some other Christians. It was farthest from the intention of THE MAIL-BAG to include these as non-Christians. The original question, not all of which was reproduced, seemed to refer more directly to those of foreign birth and non-Christian religions, who are allowed this privilege. In writing of the origin of the practice amongst the Friends one correspondent says: "They believed that the teaching of the Gospel on swearing (Matt. 5: 34-37 and James 5: 12) included judicial as well as profane swearing; consequently they could not conscientiously and therefore would not violate what they understood to be a Divine command. After suffering imprisonments and fines for refusing to swear, they were allowed to affirm." This to them is the equivalent of an oath.

THE CONSECRATION OF ST. JOHN'S

WITH deeply impressive ceremonies and all the pomp of the Episcopal Church, the choir and two memorial chapels, St. Saviour's and St. Columba's, of the Cathedral of the Church of St. John the Divine at Morningside Heights in the diocese of New York, were consecrated on April 19 according to the ancient ritual. The dedication ceremonies formed one of the largest and most striking church pageants that have ever taken place in America. While a great throng waited outside for the procession of the clergy and officials of the diocese, the more fortunate who had secured cards of admission sat awed by the dignity and beauty of the interior and heard the mighty organ fill the edifice with its wonderful music. Over all was a sunny April sky, whose light, as yet unobstructed by stained glass windows, made a glory of the gray granite arches, the snowy marble of the altar, the priceless tapestries, the flowing vestments of the clergy, and the resurrection lilies that mingled with green on the altar, the organ and the pulpit. In the nooks about the massive columns that guard the sanctuary, and in the windows of the temporary walls which close the arches, suddenly, as if to verify the words of the Psalmist, "Yea, the sparrow hath found her an house, and the swallow a nest," there was a twittering of birds. In the great crossing were placed chairs for about 2,700 people, and all were filled by a reverent crowd, whose attire told of the joy of spring. A list of those whose faces might be recognized from the apse would read like a roll of fame of the city of New York.

The Right Rev. David H. Greer, bishop of the diocese, conducted the services, and more than four hundred of the clergy, lay deputies of the General Convention, members of the Great Chapter of the Cathedral and members of the board of trustees participated in the ceremonies. The procession was led by the choir of fifty men and boys, followed by the clergy of the other Christian denominations. The clergy of the Episcopal Church were next in order. At the close of the procession marched twenty deacons, sixteen visiting bishops, the Right Rev. Dr. Burch, the Bishop Suffragan of New York, and Bishop Greer.

The robes of the churchmen made a fine display of ecclesiastical pomp as they passed in. The majority wore snowy white surplices, but over these were cast the hoods of various and rich silks. Certain of the clerics wore caps, velvet hats of archaic form and other reminders of the ancient days of the church. The brothers of the Order of the Holy Cross, three in number, arrayed from head to foot in the monkish garb of coarse white woolen, appeared in striking opposition to the rest of the clergy in their sumptuous array. Among the notable costumes were those of Pastors Anderssen and Peterssen of the Danish Church. Pastor Peterssen is from St. Thomas, West Indies. They wore, one a white surplice, the other a black gown, and both had on the wide white Elizabethan ruff that went out of profane use in James I.'s day.

As they entered the cathedral the 24th Psalm, "The earth is the Lord's and the fulness thereof," was chanted, the bishop one verse and the clergy the alternate one. The consecration ceremony was simple, following the conventional form of the Episcopal Church. After this came the reading of the instruments of donation, dealing with the cathedral itself and the chapels of St. Columba and St. Saviour, showing that they were free from debt and ready for consecration. The deeds of gift of the chair, altar, reredos, organ, and choir stalls were then read by the giver, Levi P. Morton, former governor of New York. George Gordon King read the deed for the Columba Chapel, which is a memorial to his sister, Mary LeRoy King, the gift of their mother, Mrs. Edward R. King. August Belmont presented his gift of the St. Saviour Chapel. These gifts were accepted for the board of trustees by its M. Miller, who in turn presented them to the secretary, Mr. George Bishop.

After the celebration of the communion service, Bishop Greer preached from the text, "Love the brotherhood; fear God; honor the

GOD IS LOVE

An Unpublished Sermon by DWIGHT L. MOODY, America's Greatest Evangelist*

This is the twelfth of twenty remarkable sermons by Moody, never before published, and the existence of which was disclosed only a few months ago. The absolute authenticity of the sermons is vouched for by the evangelist's son, Wm. R. Moody, who cordially approves their publication in this paper. The sermons are the exclusive property of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. One will appear each month.

MY TEXT is short enough, so that all can remember it, and it is an awfully weighty one—weightier than the whole world. You cannot weigh it or measure it. It reaches from the throne of God clear down to a lost world. Only three words: "God is love! God is love!" I believe that more than a hundred thousand people would be converted in any great city in a day if they believed that sentence—believed it, that's all. Not merely say they feel it; but believe it. Let the feelings take care of themselves. Get your feet on that rock and let the devil howl! Stand there with this "God is love." Whatever may happen, don't give it up. Hold on to it. Satan has been successful in the past six thousand years in making most of the human family believe that this is a lie. The world would swing into the light if they would believe that sentence.

Dwight L. Moody

Why does he love? I cannot tell why he set his love on such a race of sinners as we are. You might as well ask me why the sun shines. I suppose it can't help doing it. It is its nature to shine, and it is God's nature to love. It is his nature. Bless the Lord, you will never hear better news this side of heaven! Make up your mind to that. The fact is "God is love."

God's Love Immeasurable

I want to ask you a question; take it into your mind. Don't sleep to-night until you answer this satisfactorily to yourself. It is this: What more would you ask God to do to show that he loves this world than he has already done? He puts the question himself: "What more could I do for my vineyard than I have done?" He sent the holiest of men and the world drove them into dens and caves. It tied them to the stake and burned them. He sent his own Son and they put him into the grave. But God took him up out of the grave and put him on the throne and raised him for our justification. Even then he was not satisfied. He sent the Holy Ghost, and he is here to-day. "What more could I do?" God asks us. "Would you ask me to send Christ down to earth again, to suffer and die?"

If Christ should come again, and should go to Golgotha and suffer the agonies of Calvary, would it make any more sure the fact that God loves you? Would that satisfy you? Remember, this is for you. He has been trying to show that he loved this world, and he wants you to believe that God is love. Now, the trouble is that we are all the time measuring God with our little, short rule; that is the trouble with us. We are trying to measure God's love with human love. There is the mistake we make. You connot measure God's love. "It passeth knowledge." We love persons as long as they are worthy of our love, and when they are not, away they go. How many men have cast their wives off—lovely families of children—turned them away (it seems almost as if their love had turned to hate), because their wives had done some things they didn't like. Our love is not worth much; it is not skin deep. We love when everything is lovely; but when there are reverses, our love is gone.

His Love Unchangeable

Now, mark you, God's love is unchangeable. He loves right on. There is not a man or woman anywhere whom he has not loved. There is a passage I like in the thirteenth of John. It is the first verse: "Having loved his own, which were in the world, he loved them unto the end." Do you know when that was said? Listen! That was said the night that Judas went out and betrayed him and sold him for thirty pieces of silver. And when Christ uttered those words he knew that Judas was planning to sell him. "He loved them unto the end." That was the night when Peter was going to curse and swear that he never knew him. And yet he loved Peter. And I am one of those who think that it must have been terrible for Judas to have had the consciousness that Christ loved him. "Betrayest thou the Master with a kiss?" There was love mingled with that voice. And I have the idea that that was what drove Judas to suicide. He knew he had betrayed one who loved him more than his mother did, and more than he loved himself; how he betrayed one who had done nothing to hurt him, and from whom he received nothing save love and kindness; he had sold him for thirty pieces of silver. Judas went to the grave a suicide, but one look of the Master won Peter back.

I want to tell you again that Christ's love is unchangeable. You may have turned away from him; your love may have died in your heart; but he loves you still, in spite of all your backslidings and wanderings. He wants you to come back. Not only is this so, but his love is unfailing—it never fails! Never! God says in the prophecy of Isaiah, "Can a woman forget her son, the child of her breast? Yea, she may, but I never will forget thee." Never!

Now the deepest, strongest of human ties is a mother's love for her child. There is something that will separate a man from his wife, or even a father from his boy; but there is nothing in the wide, wide world that will separate a mother from her own child—that is, a real mother. I will admit there are mothers that have drunk so much whisky as to turn against their own offspring; mothers so steeped in sin that they turn against their children; but where you find a true mother, she will never give up her child. So the prophet asks, "Can a mother forget her child? She may; but I will never forget thee." God's love is higher, deeper and broader than a mother's love. A mother loves more than the child can love the mother. I used to tell my mother—I used to climb up on her knee and say, "I love you the most." Mother would say, "It is impossible." I doubted my mother; but when I became a father, and my boy said that to me, I realized what my mother had meant when she said, "It is impossible."

A Love That Is Unfailing

Do you tell me that I don't love my child far more than he can love me? If a child sees his father in the coffin, in a few days his tears are gone and perhaps he has forgotten it. If you see him in the coffin, will you forget it? Won't your mind go back to that grave from time to time? Could you forget your own child? Never! There was a time when I used to think more of Jesus Christ than of God the Father. I had a false idea of God. I thought about him as stern; on the other hand, Jesus Christ had come in as a mediator; he had appeased the wrath of an angry God; and Jesus brought more to me than did the Father. But I made this discovery: that it took more love for God to give his Son than for the Son to come and die. Is there a man or woman who would not rather suffer than see the child suffer? You tell me that it cost more to redeem this world. When God gave Christ to this world, he gave all he had; he gave the richest jewel he had. And this is the Gospel, as free as the air we breathe; but it cost God something when he gave up the Son of his bosom. Never doubt the love of God. Don't doubt that for a moment.

I was speaking in St. Louis, a number of years ago, and Dr. Goodell, now dead, was telling me that he was brought up in Vermont. He said there was a boy who used to go to school with him, the lad really lived next door to him; but his father was a very bad man, and seemed to take delight in taking the boy into every kind of vice and sin, until the boy became so bad that the Goodell family thought it would ruin their boy to let the two play together. So he was forbidden to play with the neighbor's boy. How much interest in him they had! It wasn't long before the father died, and then the boy went on from bad to worse, until at last he was arrested for murder. When he was brought into court for trial, he turned out to be the roughest criminal Vermont had ever known. He had killed five different persons. When he was on trial for his life, that mother in the court seemed to take in every word said against her boy, and it seemed to hurt her far more than it did the accused. Men wondered how she could love such a man. She could not help it. God planted that love in her breast. When the verdict was brought in and the youth was condemned, that mother went the length and breadth of Vermont trying to get men to sign a petition asking the governor to pardon. After it was all over, she begged the governor to let her have her son's body that she might put it into the old family burial plot, where she might plant flowers upon it and water them with her tears. They say that death has burned down everything in this world. It has never burned out the love of a mother. The governor said, "No." By the law of the State, the criminal must be buried in the prison yard. Then the mother begged that her own body might be taken and buried close to that of her boy. She was the only one in the universe whom he loved, and she thought she had a right to be laid by his side. That is a mother's love! Willing for love's sake to have her grave pointed out for all coming time as that of the mother of a noted criminal!

God says, "I can never forget thee." God's love is deeper and broader even than that. It never, never fails. A friend of mine told me that an acquaintance of his was at a great dinner party, and he was struck with the graceful manner in which the lady of the house presided. He found that he had left something in the dining-room and he went back to get it, and he found this lady with a sick child, sitting by the table. With a trembling voice, she introduced him as her youngest son; and she said, "He has gone far away, but I love him still." Of course she did. That's the love that's going to bring this old world back. Tell the world that God loves with an unchangeable, unfailing love.

A Love That Is Endless

Mother! Have you got a family of seven children, and one of them is gone astray? Don't you love that prodigal one? Is there a night that you don't lift your heart in prayer for him, or a day pass in which you don't cry to heaven for that boy? Now, if you love that erring one, don't you think God loves those that are gone astray? There are none that he does not love. The devil has made them believe that God is their enemy. Let us contradict the lie. Let us publish the good news that "God is love." He loves, whether they believe it or not. He loves with an everlasting love. Jeremiah puts that word in: He loves with an "everlasting love." No end to it! How can we measure "everlasting"? Our government was trying to make a treaty with the Indians, and put in the word "forever." An Indian said, "I wish you would put in 'As long as water runs and grass grows.'" Forever! There is no end to God's love.

Then, if God loves all, will all be saved? Listen! God wants to save you; but if you despise the love of God and turn from it, how can you get the benefit of it? Here is a boy who has a mother, gentle and loving as any being on earth; yet he will turn his back on that mother and go into the deeps of sin. He gets no benefit from that mother's love. The love is there, all the same, just as the sun is shining on the just and the unjust; but you can go to the cellar and shut out the sunlight. Aren't men doing that? Aren't they shutting out the love of God? I understand that that is what they are doing. They are outrunning the love of God—despising the love of God.

Will You Reject His Love?

One of the saddest things I know is a man who crushes his mother's love under his heel. What is going to become of a man who spurns the love of God? I was going West some time ago and a gentleman who had heard I was going, said, "I have a son-in-law and a daughter-in-law, and they will probably come to one of your meetings. If they do, and you can get their confidence, I wish you would tell them that, if they will come back to a certain State, I will buy the best farm in that State, and they need never come to see me if they will only take it as a gift." The old man said, "I have got two daughters and they are both married, and one daughter thinks I think more of the other daughter, and I cannot make them believe that there is no difference toward them in my heart. I have tried every way I can. I sent money in letters, and they send them back, not even opening them." (He was a man of wealth.) "I have done everything to show them that my love is the same."

When I got to that city, the very first man I saw was that son-in-law. He asked me to his house. I gladly went, for I had an errand. It turned out just as I was told. He said, "Now, look here; I want it understood that you are not to speak about my father-in-law. I don't want you to mention that old hypocrite in my house." I said, "You will please

Another List of Scripture Questions for Christian Herald Readers to Study and Solve

AN avalanche of letters has come in response to the second list of Bible questions, published in these columns, demonstrating the very general appreciation of this new and instructive feature of Bible study. Many of the letters testify to the thorough enjoyment the writers experienced in solving the questions, and express the hope that they may be continued. "I have found them a great help to me in my Bible study" is an expression frequently encountered. It is surprising to note the keen interest and pleasure with which this great volunteer Bible class has set to work and the results are certainly such as prove beyond a doubt that a very large proportion of those who have begun this line of study know their Bible and know it well.

We print below the correct answers to the second list, and the names of those readers who have made the highest record. It should be explained that Question 8 should originally have read, "How many times do the words Jesus Christ appear in the Gospels?" The answers are as follows:

To the second list of questions 597 answers were received up to the date of going to press. Every letter was examined, and all the letters were graded according to the number of correct answers given by the writers. Nine sent perfect answers to all the questions; 31 answered 19 questions correctly; 66 answered 18; 93 answered 17; 109 answered 16; 93 answered 15; 68 answered 14; 41 answered 13; 35 answered 12; 14 answered 11; 14 answered 10; 7 answered 9; 5 answered 8; 1 answered 7; 4 answered 6; 1 answered 5; 1 answered 3; and 5 answered 2. All these answers were correct, in the order stated.

Can Giants Be Grown at Will?

By EUGENE THWING

"WHICH of you by taking thought can add one cubit unto his stature?" The manner of asking this question implied, of necessity, a negative answer. Obviously such a thing was impossible; yet science to-day is asking the question again, "Can giants be grown at will?" and this time the manner of asking is almost a demand for an affirmative answer.

At the base of the brain is a queer little gland—just a tiny morsel of tissue—called the pituitary body, or gland. Its use, until recently, was not known. To-day it is found to be more vital to life than the stomach, a lung, a section of brain, or many other organs. A man can live for months separated from his stomach, but the removal of the little pituitary body will cause death inside of forty-eight hours. It is the belief of investigators that the secret of the growth of the body rests in this gland. The rapid deduction is made that the functions of the pituitary gland can be so modified and controlled by surgical and chemical skill that a race of giants may be produced at will.

WE NEED not wait for the wizardry of laboratory workers. Let them alone with their miscroscopes and their testing tubes. We have the answer to their question—every one of us. Giants can be grown at will. It has been done again and again, ever since the time of Joshua and Caleb. The sons of Anak were tall; they had the great reach of arm, and the mighty muscle. Some of the spies called them "giants," but they were dwarfs in comparison with Joshua and Caleb. The other ten spies were pigmies and "grasshoppers." Caleb had seen the sons of Anak, yet he stood before the whimpering crowd and said, "Let us go up at once . . . for we are well able to overcome." He and Joshua were the real giants in that whole assembly.

William Lloyd Garrison was a young fellow in his twenties. With one assistant and a negro boy he started the Liberator, announcing his purpose in these words: "I am in earnest; I will not equivocate; I will not excuse; I will not retreat a single inch; and I will be heard." By the power of that unyielding will he grew to be a giant in the cause of human freedom.

DISRAELI was hated and sneered at. His person and his acts were treated with contempt. His first speech in Parliament was drowned with coughs and hisses. Turning upon his tormentors he declared that the time would come when they should hear him. By the power of his will he grew to be such a giant in debate that the very men who had laughed and hissed him down were later made to writhe under his terrible sarcasm. Such illustrations are countless in number. Men of puny and sickly bodies have made themselves robust and strong; shop-boys and mechanics have become captains of industry; the rail-splitter and the canal-boy became Presidents of the nation.

A STORY is told of the civil war in Spain. Don Basilio was a captain in the army of Isabella. His friend Ramon was with the Carlists. Don Basilio was captured and sentenced, with twenty others, to be shot. The execution began. Don Basilio was tenth in the line. Seven had fallen. Two more, and then Don Basilio. At that moment Ramon ran to him and seized him in his arms. "Not this one! Not this one, General!" he cried.

"Why not this one? Is he a musician?" asked the general. The Carlists did not shoot the musicians, as the latter did not injure them during the fight; also because they needed music bands for their battalions.

"A musician!" exclaimed Ramon; "yes, yes, General, he is a musician; a grand musician."

"Upon what instrument does he play?"

"The—the—ah, now I remember; the French horn!"

Don Basilio could not play on any instrument; he did not understand a single note of music. The band to which he was alloted was to be organized in fourteen days. Death faced him and the friend who had saved him. Here is what Don Basilio said to his friend: "In fourteen days I shall know music; in fourteen days I will play upon the horn." The French horn is a very difficult instrument to learn. Don Basilio tells the story:

"In fourteen days—ah, the power of the will!—in fourteen days, with their fourteen nights (I did not sleep for half a month)—yes, you have cause to be astonished—in fourteen days I learned to play upon the horn! What days they were! Ramon and I went to the fields and spent our days with a musician who came from a neighboring place to instruct me. I spoke nothing, I thought nothing, I ate nothing. My only thought was music—the French horn. I wanted to learn, and I learned it. Had I been dumb, I should have learned to speak; if lame, to walk; if blind, to see—because it was my will to do it. Ah, the will! that is the greatest power on earth. I had the will to do it; therein lies the whole deed. I had the will—and I succeeded."

CAN giants be grown at will? The scientist puts his question better than he intends. The most wonderful technique of the surgeon, or skill of the chemist, at best is restricted; but the will can do miracles. The will admits no restrictions—it knows no bounds. It may well be that the cleverest jugglery of scientific instruments and agencies may not produce giants of physical measurement. After all, what is the body but a garment, or a dwelling place? A very large body may be the home or a dwarf or the weak form of a very small child may hold the soul of a giant. In many of our homes there are boys who should know, and feel a joy in knowing, that giants can be grown at will.

The will—it is a wonderful thing. It lays all science, all knowledge, all wealth under tribute. The schoolboy, the errand boy, the farmer's boy may have no money, or no influence. If he have the will, he may some day stand forth in the world of men as a veritable giant in power and achievement.

The Coronation Programme

To Be a Most Imposing Ceremonial, and Also a Most Biblical One : : :

By WILLIAM DURBAN, London

EVERY one of the many associations and details connected with the coronation of an English monarch seems wonderfully calculated to add to its profound and solemn impressiveness, apart from the gorgeous and grandiose character of the ceremony. There is probably no event celebrated in the modern world that can compare with this august occasion. No inauguration of an exalted dignitary is in anything like the same degree invested with the sanctity derived from the precedents recorded in Holy Scripture.

Thursday, June 22, will witness the enthronement and coronation of George V. and Mary, both already beloved by the people for their sweet and simple domestic life, their pure love for each other, and their absolute devotion to their children. The grand rite will of course, as has been the case for over a thousand years, take place in the most venerated of all British sanctuaries, built near the close of the Saxon period, before the Norman Conquest — the magnificent Abbey Church of St. Peter, Westminster.

The occasion is to be graced by the presence of a host of magnificently robed officials, ecclesiastical dignitaries, functionaries, peers, military and naval officers, and noble ladies. For three months before the event, Westminster Abbey is closed, so elaborate are the preparations needed for the celebrated occasion. The most prominent amongst the officiating dignitaries will be the Archbishops of Canterbury and York, and the Bishops of Durham, and of Bath and Wells; the Bishop of Winchester and the Dean of Westminster, together with the Grand Chamberlain, having parts assigned to them.

It will readily be seen, from a brief description of the principal details of the ritual, how great a part is played by sacred symbolism. Thus the Coronation is more replete with solemn and religious suggestions than any other modern celebration ever witnessed anywhere. The Introit inaugurates the proceedings, for the entrance of the two Royal Consorts into the Abbey is signalized, as soon as they appear within the West Door, by the choral chanting of an anthem taken from Psalm 132, "I was glad when they said unto me, We will go up into the house of the Lord." A magnificent procession, headed by the two Archbishops and many Bishops, follows the sovereigns to the peculiarly constructed dais erected for the occasion. This dais is intended to be the focus of a glorious and solemnizing spectacle. On it takes place a significant performance, for it is the scene of what is known as the Recognition.

But some impressive preliminaries are first observed which show the deeply religious stamp of all the proceedings, for the King and Queen first pass by their thrones and kneel at "faldstools" to offer short private prayers. These are offered at the south side of the altar. Then the royal pair are placed on what are called their "Chairs of Estate." The Archbishop of Canterbury as Primate of all England now turns to the east part of the dais and in a loud voice speaks to the whole assembly in the following proclamation:

"Sirs, I here present unto you King George, the undoubted King of this Realm: Wherefore all of you who are come this day to do your homage and service, Are you willing to do the same?"

The people instantly by loud and repeated acclamations respond, crying out, "God save King George!"

The Archbishop repeats the proclamation at each of the other three sides of the dais, receiving the same assurances of allegiance. To crowds outside the Abbey loud trumpet-blasts by heralds announce the compact. Next the Litany is chanted by the august assembly, and then, as the very heart of the occasion is sacramental, Holy Communion is observed; for it is the main purpose of this ceremonial to impress on the mind of the monarch that he is expected to live as the "first Christian" in his Empire in the eyes of all the nation. A short sermon is delivered, before which the King puts on his cap of crimson velvet, turned up with ermine. On his right stands the Bishop of Durham, and beyond him, on the same side, the lords who carry the swords, and on his left side the Bishop of Bath and Wells and also the Lord Great Chamberlain.

On February 6, in the presence of the two Houses of Parliament, the King and Queen signed the prescribed Declaration of fidelity to the Protestant Reformed Religion, and now in Westminster Abbey the Coronation Oath to the same purport is administered, the King laying his hand on the Bible as he repeats the vow of fealty. The Anointing now follows. The King returns to his Chair, and he and the Queen kneel at their "faldstools" while the hymn, "Come, Holy Spirit," is sung. The Anointing is a peculiarly significant rite. The oil used is first consecrated by the Primate and is called "holy oil," just as in Bible days. Thus were Saul, David, and Solomon anointed kings. On the altar for this occasion stands a remarkable vessel, shaped like an eagle, fashioned 800 years ago and styled the ampulla. With oil poured from its beak, the monarch is anointed in the form of a cross on the head, as the seat of thought; on the breast, as the seat of emotion and affection; on the hands, as instruments of action. Three times, as the Primate performs the solemn chrism with the unction, he repeats the formula, "Be anointed with holy oil as kings, prophets, and priests were anointed. In the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost. Amen." The King, while the hymn is being sung, takes his place in the venerated chair of King Edward I., made in the year 1300, which has ever since constituted the Coronation Chair. Here takes place the highly symbolical Investiture.

The British Houses of Parliament, from the Thames

This ceremony is styled the Investiture per annulum et per baculum. The monarch must be arrayed in the Robes of Office. He is girded with the sword of Justice; clad in the Imperial Mantle; invested with the ecclesiastical Dalmatic and Stole, just as if receiving priestly ordination and called to the sacerdotal function and becoming God's minister, as indeed St. Paul calls a king. Then is placed in his hands the Orb, a gem-studded ball of gold surmounted by a cross, to remind him that the whole world is subject to Christ. Next on his finger is placed a ring engraved with a cross. This is the Royal Signet Ring, and at that moment the Primate prays that he may be "sealed with the Spirit of promise." The Royal Scepter, the token of kingly justice, and the Rod with the Dove, that of equity and mercy, are now placed in the right and left hand of the king respectively.

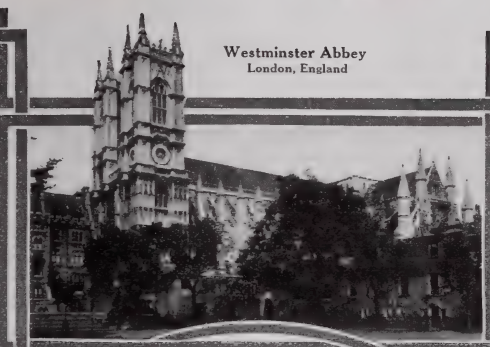
Now comes the climax. The Archbishop takes the Crown, blazing with many priceless jewels, from the altar, but immediately lays it on again, this action signifying that the august symbol of supreme rule is from God, and that to God it will be returned in due time. Then as the Crown is reverently placed on the royal head the Abbey resounds with shouts of "God save the King!" The religious ceremony concludes with the Benediction. But now the newly-crowned King is enthroned after his Coronation; that is, he is "lifted to his throne" by the Archbishops and other Peers, the Te Deum being sung. Then the Prelates and Peers do homage according to an ancient custom, kissing the King's cheek as Samuel kissed the cheek of Saul. The Queen is then robed, anointed and crowned. Finally, the two monarchs put off their crowns and humbly prostrate themselves, receiving once more the Holy Communion, and the great celebration is over.

TOPICS OF INTEREST THROUGHOUT THE WORLD

—DR. EDWIN D. MEAD of Boston writes us that a number of American college and university students recently sent a subscription to China for relief work as "a testimonial of sympathy from the American students and a recognition of China's movement for the New Education."

—THE NEW BRITISH battleship cruiser Indefatigable has broken all records for speed at sea for ships of her dimensions. She has been making twenty-nine knots per hour in her recent speed trials. The vessel was launched at Devonport in October, 1909. In her trials in 1910 she is said to have made twenty-seven knots with reduced power.

—JEWISH COLONIZATION in Egypt has been progressing at an unusual rate in recent years. Many of these immigrants come from Russia and are proving themselves capable colonists and good farmers. It is a strange coincidence that this latest development of Jewish immigration should have been directed toward the race's ancient "land of bondage." The ages, however, have wrought this difference: that they can now live there peacefully under government protection and free from the persecution and race hatred that have followed them so frequently in Europe.



—REPORTS FROM ST. JOHN, N. B., and Halifax, N. S., state that all records for immigrants landed at those ports have been broken during the winter season which recently closed. This increase has been largely at the expense of Boston, New York and other United States ports, according to the steamship officials. While most of the immigrants have settled in the Canadian Northwest, there is said to have been a considerable entry to lands in the Western part of the United States. The shorter passage of four and five days, as compared with six and seven days, is given as a reason for favoring Canadian ports. It is estimated that more than 100,000 persons were landed since last November, compared with 68,000 during a similar period last year.

—A WEALTHY NEW YORK woman has sued a firm of beautifiers for heavy damages because, as she alleges, her hair has turned green from the use of a dye with which it was treated to restore its natural color. Her hair had become gray, although she is comparatively young. The dye employed inflamed the scalp and caused serious illness. The case is a typical one, as showing results that no doubt may be duplicated in many instances where "beautification" has been resorted to in order to preserve the appearance of youth.

Our Palestine Pilgrimage

IN THE old pilgrim days, it was the ambition of every true believer to visit the Holy Land. This was the one desire toward which all his efforts tended, and for the accomplishment of which he was willing to make great sacrifice. In those early days travel was difficult, and the journey to Palestine was a serious undertaking. Now, however, our swift modern railroad and steamship facilities have placed a Holy Land tour within easy reach. It calls neither for great outlay nor long absence. The journey across the Atlantic in the vast palatial ocean fliers occupies only a few days. Our large liners are replete with every accommodation and comfort to make the trip a pleasure and an exhilaration. The Atlantic crossed, they run up the Mediterranean under blue skies, through a region full of historic and sacred interest. Rome, Greece and Egypt visited, the latter-day pilgrims are at last in Palestine, the land of their dreams and the goal of the Christian's desire. All the holy places are visited; we come into actual contact with the scenes and people described in the Old and New Testaments, for the passing centuries make little change in the ancient East. At every stage of our journey new light is shed on the Bible. Faith is strengthened and spiritual life quickened. We ourselves become, as it were, a part of the great Bible story—a participant in the sacred drama of the world's redemption. Such a journey is a fitting crown to a Christian life.

Readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD are now offered the opportunity to make this pilgrimage at a figure far below what it ordinarily costs. Some few among them may already have visited Palestine, and would no doubt be glad to repeat the journey under such pleasant auspices and at comparatively little cost. To those who have never been there, it is the opportunity of a lifetime. It will be an experience full of inspiration and instruction; one to which every member of the party can look back with pleasure and delight. To Bible students and Christian workers of both sexes it will be a priceless asset on which they may draw in the coming years.

We urge all who desire to take advantage of this opportunity to visit the Holy Land to send their names and addresses to "THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Pilgrimage Bureau, Bible House, New York," and they will receive by mail all the necessary particulars. The journey will be "personally conducted," and we hope to have a goodly company along when the delightful sixty days' pilgrimage begins on September 20.

The Decay of the Saloon

IT IS well to hear both sides of a question before forming an opinion. Lately, the liquor press has been endeavoring, by strenuous publication in many quarters, to demonstrate the utter failure of prohibition in the South. The result has been to mislead many as to the actual condition of affairs in several States. A reader of this journal in Georgia directs attention to this species of exaggeration and says, "It is the purpose of the liquor forces to publish in one State what a lamentable failure prohibition has proven to be in another State. Georgia consumes some liquor yet; but the open barroom there is a thing of the past." The Atlanta Georgian dealing with the subject says:

"Georgia has prospered under prohibition. It has increased in wealth and population, while Atlanta has leaped to second place among the cities of the South. Exploded beyond repair is the old contention that prohibition hurts business. It hurts only the whisky business and boosts all others. Atlanta was never in the midst of such business and building activity as it is now. In Atlanta, moreover, prohibition has decreased drunkenness, crime and disorder. This has been shown by indisputable statistics. Prohibition has killed the old whisky saloon—an organized force corruptive both of society and of politics; and the law has been enforced, too, perhaps as well as could have been expected of any law passed over opposition as strong. Sentiment for its better enforcement is growing everywhere. As to the prohibition law of this State—with all its faults, Georgia will cling to it still."

The Georgian goes further and claims that the impression has been given by the liquor organs that one by one the prohibition States of the South are looking forward to repealing their State-wide laws, when, as a matter of fact, nothing is further from the truth. In Alabama, the apparent reaction has merely been the result of too drastic legislation. In Tennessee with a prohibition governor, and a prohibition combination controlling the legislature which recently elected a prohibitionist to the United States Senate, there is no immediate likelihood of repeal. Violations of the law there are and will be, as long as human nature remains unchanged; but the one momentous fact remains that the saloon in these Southern sections has gone! And this is something for which to be thankful. It would be pleasing if these conditions could be duplicated in other than Southern States.

Cathedral Spires

IN HIS consecration sermon at the Cathedral of the Church of St. John the Divine, Bishop Greer said we are living in an age when men's thoughts are more occupied with temporalities than with temples. The stress of our modern life leaves little time to devote to those phases of thought and action which occupied such a large share of the attention of our ancestors. They built their cathedrals in the old mother-lands in the "age of faith"—a testimony to the dream and the hope of a church universal. The great Cathedral of St. John the Divine, whose choir has just been consecrated with such dignity and solemnity, cannot perform for the people of the teeming city above which it towers such full-rounded service as did those of England, France, Italy and Germany. As those have stood through the centuries to gather about them the hallowed associations of history, so may it stand till in the progress of divine Providence it shall lift its spires in another and a freer age of faith—itself a testimony to the religious brotherhood of humanity. As one looks upon that splendid pile, unfinished as yet, but whose mighty arches and great buttresses point forward to a day of completion, he cannot but be impressed by the thought of the coming centuries in which it shall be a monument to the Giver of every good and perfect gift. The beautiful pageant that marked the dedication of that portion of the Cathedral which has been finished, may fittingly be the prototype of its service to the community, in pointing ever onward and upward to that which is highest and best.

Timidity and Boldness

SOME mere man, whom we suspect of timidity, since he hides his identity, writes to this journal that the only obstacle to granting the suffrage to women is the hesitancy of the other sex to grant them what they ask, so long as they persistently lean toward such abnormalities as the big hat and the hobble. He deferentially submits the suggestion that a mind well-poised and equipped for the more serious duties of life would not be carried away by such trivialities. Of course, this is both ungallant and absurd. When meetings are held to discuss the problem of equal suffrage, it seems unfortunate that trivial, silly and ill-tempered words should be spoken. The question is vital and will be decided in this country by and by, in the way that suits the majority. Whenever American women show convincingly that a majority of them wish to vote, the ballot will be granted them. In the meantime one strenuous editor who has declared that husbands are weak and should keep their wives in subjection, quoting St. Paul as an authority, is very much a back number, theologically and sociologically. People who quote Scripture, twisting it out of its proper meaning to prove what they wish, are hardly fitted for the full blaze of the twentieth century. Until the pros and cons of this matter can be discussed without allusions to women's dress and vanity, and without insult and loss of equanimity on either side, nothing worth speaking of will take place in settling the matter at issue. Let us have good temper and fair play and the battle will be a pleasanter one all round.

Circles of Prayer

THE Woman's Foreign Mission Jubilee, which began in Oakland, Calif., last October and closed its sessions in New York in the latter part of March, had one significant feature among many others. Now that it is in the past and we look back upon it, the feature standing out most conspicuously is that of its intense spirituality. In every city for weeks before the meetings were held there were special gatherings of women for prayer. In many cities and churches the women's prayer meeting, which had been given up because of the pressure of other meetings and obligations, was revived. Circles of women met at each other's homes for prayer that God's blessing might come on the movement, that the interest in foreign missions might be heightened and deepened, and that the money might flow into the treasury for the increase of the work. This wave of prayer sweeping across the continent cannot but prove a wonderful blessing in that it will show women that without the presence of the Saviour their efforts can be of slight avail. So deep was the impression made upon individuals that in some towns nothing else was talked about over the telephone, and every social arrangement was made in accordance with the necessities and demands of the Jubilee meetings. The words of Dr. Noble, the missionary physician from India, whose plain and telling statements aroused her listeners to sympathy and carried them into the privacies of the zenana, can never be forgotten by those who heard them.

Great Chinese Loan Arranged

—THE AGREEMENT for the $50,000,000 loan to China by a group of American, English, German, and French financiers, negotiations for which have been going on for some time, was signed recently. The loan is secured by the provincial revenues. According to the terms of the agreement the banking groups representing the United States, Gerat Britain, France and Germany will pay to China $5,000,000 immediately, $5,000,000 when the Powers have approved of the currency reform and the Manchurian development schemes, and the balance of the loan in instalments covering some months. The agreement does not provide for a financial adviser to the Chinese Government, the Chinese having refused to allow that provision to be included, but the Peking Government addressed a note to William J. Calhoun, the American Minister, asking him to appoint an adviser.

Italy's Fiftieth Anniversary

ITALY and Rome are as old as civilization. They go back to the earliest period of European history, and have an important relation to it; but modern Italy is just fifty years old now, and the semi-centennial anniversary of the foundation of United Italy is celebrated in Rome and Turin by an exposition of magnificent proportions. Our Civil War was just beginning when the throes of revolution had been passed in Italy and a united nation with its new liberty was formed. Among the men who had an important part in the making of modern Italy were Cavour, Garibaldi, Mazzini, and Victor Immanuel II. Humbert I. and Victor Immanuel III. played their important parts more recently. King Victor Immanuel opened the Exposition of Fine Arts in the Vigna Cartoni; on the day following he inaugurated the Exhibition of Retrospective Art in the Castle of Sant' Angelo—the Mausoleum of the Emperor Hadrian and his successors—which is to be converted into a permanent mediæval museum, retaining many of the exhibits now shown. Among other beautiful things there will be a corner of Venice produced on the Lagoons erected for the International Exposition. There will be a round of events in harmony with the greatness of the event which is being celebrated. Italy caught the spirit of progress which is the breath of God. The prophets, rejoicing at national prosperity, can be voiced by united Italy.

Thou hast increased the nation, O Lord, thou hast increased the nation; thou art glorified. (Isa. 26:15.)

Solved Riddle of Sphinx

Professor G. A. Reisner of Harvard, who has just returned from Egypt, believes that he has solved the riddle of the Sphinx, which has baffled the world for thousands of years. The professor announced recently that in his exploration he had found the remains of the palace of Ahab and Jezebel. He has just unearthed the statue of the builder of the Third Pyramid, who belonged to the fourth dynasty, and his headdress is exactly like that of the Sphinx. He claims that the Sphinx is none other than Cephren, son of that Cheops who built for himself the first and greatest pyramid of the three huge tombs. The professor says: "The Great Sphinx is the guardian of the sacred precincts of the Second Pyramid, placed beside the causeway leading to the pyramid. The body is the body of a lion. The head is the head of Cephren, the king who built the Second Pyramid and carved the Sphinx out of a knob of natural rock." That the Sphinx should guard the pyramid was natural. Such images frequently protected tombs. The inscription on one such sphinx reads: "I protect the chapel of thy tomb, I guard thy sepulchral chamber, I ward off the intruding stranger, I cast down thy foes to the ground and their arms with them, I drive away the wicked from the chapel of thy tomb, I destroy thine adversaries in their lurking place, blocking it that they may no more come forth." This calm assurance of power and ultimate victory has seemed to create a soul for the Great Sphinx. Nearly five thousand years it has stood in the shifting desert sands, and it always has had a way of troubling people's consciences. The Greek Sphinx had a riddle which the generations were unable to solve. It was this: "What animal is it that goes on four feet in the morning, on two feet at noon, and on three feet at night?" Oedipus guessed that it was man, who when a baby crawled on all fours, at noon of manhood walked upright on two feet, and in the evening of old age walked with two feet and a staff. The story goes that on the solving of the riddle the Sphinx fell to pieces. Life is a Sphinx, guarding the entrance to the tomb. It has a riddle which no one but Jesus the Nazarene ever saw, the one Who hath abolished death, and hath brought life and immortality to light through the Gospel. (II. Tim. 1:10.)

Bridegroom at Ninety-six

A prosperous farmer of Baltimore County, Maryland, concluded to marry the second time. He courted a maiden of some seventy summers and the day of the wedding was set. The man went to Towson to obtain the marriage license. After some search he found the courthouse and entered the clerk's office, and noticing a number of persons about one of the clerks securing licenses, he asked for one for himself, receiving it and paying the fee, $1.50. When he reached home and opened the envelope, he found that his license was a permit to shoot birds in Baltimore County for one year, instead of a permission to marry his sweetheart. As there were no trains between then and the hour set for the wedding, he started out afoot for the courthouse to repair his mistake. He found the public building closed, but sought a deputy, who opened the door, and gave him the license he desired, charging him a dollar for it. He wanted the money he had paid for the bird permit to go as a credit on his license, but the clerk would not allow him to do so, and he was made to pay the penalty of his mistake. He walked back home again and the Methodist minister of his village pronounced the couple man and wife. There is perhaps no subject on which people will volunteer so much advice to their neighbors as on that of marriage. The friendly and unfriendly suggestions as to the age, size, quality and character of candidates for the matrimonial estate are almost as many as the persons entering upon the life contract. We may be mistaken, but we are of the opinion that it would have been wise for the old man almost at the century goal to have kept his license to shoot birds, and to have asked the bride-to-be to excuse him from his foolish agreement. Age and childhood are both beautiful things, but a second childhood is a pitiful period, and contradicts the rule that years bring prudence and wisdom.

With the ancient is wisdom; and in length of days understanding. (Job 12:12.)

Distinguished Fire Chief

Edward F. Croker, after twenty-seven years of service within the fire lines of New York, and after a dozen years as Chief of the Fire Department, was retired on a pension of $6,000 a year the other day. He does not intend to retire from all activity, but will devote the rest of his life to the prevention of fires. He was made Chief of the Fire Department when only thirty-seven years of age, and, next to the lamented Colonel Waring, there has perhaps not been a city official more popular and successful than Fire Chief Croker. He had a perfect passion for putting out fires, and a genius which gave singular efficiency to his endeavors. The United States leads the world in the wonderful machines for putting out fires, and yet there is scarcely a country of Europe that does not surpass us in preventing conflagrations. In spite of our efficient fire departments in the cities, the annual fire losses in the country must amount to $200,000,000. As sanitary science nowadays is more interested in preventing than curing diseases, so the great fire conqueror of the future will be the one who can come nearest to preventing fires. Croker, the distinguished firefighter, will be a great blessing to his generation if he shall be spared yet many years to teach the nation how to prevent these disastrous conflagrations. In the training of children, in the formation of character, in growth in grace, it is so much better to guard against the fire than to have to go to work and put it out. The Saviour enjoins this spiritual caution and prudence in his words:

Watch ye therefore, and pray always, that ye may be accounted worthy to escape all these things that shall come to pass, and to stand before the Son of Man. (Luke 21:36.)

Planting Trees

The 30th day of April was tree planting day. The school children in America very generally observed the day and grown people also joined in the delightful exercise. Some named their trees Charter Oak, Treaty Elm, Newton's Apple Tree, Washington's Cherry Tree, after the famous trees of history. Some imitated the custom in New England of planting friendship gardens, the names of those planting the trees being cut in the bark, as beautiful and perpetual expressions of friendship. The ax of civilization has murdered the trees by the wholesale, destroying material values, exhausting the streams, and threatening serious damage to future generations. It is fortunate that the attention of the nation to the repair of this damage is so practical and efficient. They have suffered also by the destruction of forests in New Zealand. There was a volcanic eruption in the Mount Tarawera district in the centre of North Island twenty-five years ago, which destroyed all vegetation. The government is employing its prisoners in replanting the trees. The men are allowed $2 apiece for every larch tree planted. Each man is allowed to have his own hut, and all have the benefit of a library and social centre. Of course only first offenders with a light record are set to this class of work. Last year these men set out 3,500,000 trees. It seems that our Federal and State governments might set many of the prisoners to the task of tree planting, which would be healthful to the bodies and minds of the convicts, and of advantage to the country. There is a beautiful description of tree-planting in olden times.

I made me gardens and orchards, and I planted trees in them of all kinds of fruits; I made me pools of water, to water therewith the wood that bringeth forth trees. (Eccles. 2:5, 6.)

Mother's Letter Saved Boy

Glenn Koss, twenty-two years old, who enlisted in the United States Army in Chicago and took the money furnished him for passage to Jefferson Barracks and spent it on a drunken spree in which he went through to Memphis, reported to the recruiting officers there and was returned as an embezzler to Chicago, where he was arraigned before Judge Landis of the United States District Court. The judge got hold of a letter the boy's mother had written to him, which was as follows: "The trouble that you are in is almost more than I can bear. Your trouble is serious, and I know it was drink. But you must be honest with the court that tries you, and must take your punishment like a man. You must be true to your country even though you have to go to prison. I would rather have you in jail than in a saloon. If you will only brace up and be a man and stop drinking we shall be glad to have you come home when you have served your punishment, whatever it may be. Your father will give you work if you do not drink. I will pray for you every night, as I always have done, and that you will come home to us and be true to yourself and your country." After reading the letter the Judge said: "Glenn, a boy who has a mother like that cannot be totally bad. If you will promise me that you will stop drinking and try to be a credit to your people I will not send you to prison. I will impose the trifling sentence of $50 fine on you and hold the prison penalty in abeyance. Go home to the job, send me $8 a week until your fine is paid, as the evidence of your sincerity and repentance." The young man with deep emotion said he would, and went home to his people, and resolved upon a better life. Something beside his human will will be required for his reformation; Christ's help and that of the Church will be necessary. How like an angel from heaven is a mother's influence over her wayward son! A mother's love is the nearest to omnipotence of anything this side of the white throne. The injunction of the Good Book we would suggest to this young man in his determination to reform:

My son, hear the instruction of thy father, and forsake not the law of thy mother. (Prov. 1:8.)

A NATION-WIDE CHILD CRUSADE

Mrs. Frank De Garmo

THE National Congress of Mothers, at its triennial convention in Washington this year, celebrates its fifteenth anniversary. The work of the Congress has gone on steadily and quietly during the years, and has been extended into other lands, where the ideas of better conditions for children and a higher standard of home life have won great hospitality.

The National Congress of Mothers now has nineteen national departments. Prominent among these are the new departments of rural child welfare, under the chairmanship of Mrs. Frank DeGarmo, of St. Louis, Mo.; child welfare legislation, Miss Mary Garrett, of Philadelphia, chairman; child labor, Miss P. J. McGovern, Atlanta, Ga., chairman; and child hygiene, Mrs. Walter S. Brown, Des Moines, Ia., chairman. The new work of rural child welfare is especially directed towards betterment of conditions in rural communities, the first and practical step in this direction being the promotion of good roads between isolated homes and schools and churches. Active work is already being done in the legislatures of eighteen States to secure better roads, the Mothers' Clubs co-operating with other agencies.

Mrs. J. P. Bryan

Work for open-air schools and better sanitary conditions in schoolrooms forms another new department taken up by the National Congress of Mothers. Many mothers are longing for the power to exert their responsibility as resident mothers now do in the splendid States of Wyoming, Colorado, Idaho, Utah and Washington.

The mother movement in Washington State is having a boom through the enfranchisement of the home-makers and the women of the State. There will soon be mothers' circles in all the twenty-six schools of Tacoma. Home and school work has also been introduced in Utah through the efforts of Mrs. Clarence Allen of Salt Lake City, State president. In Idaho, the mother work has made a good beginning at Boise, being closely connected with the church and club organizations.

Among the newly-fledged State organizations is Massachusetts, of which Mrs. Alice B. Merryman, of Haverhill, is the first president, and which had 105 delegates, representing 3,000 members, at its first annual convention in Waltham last February. The younger State organizations include those of Rhode Island, Ohio, Wisconsin, Indiana and Tennessee, where work for rural schools is bringing parents and teachers together.

In the older State Congresses, like New York, Connecticut, California, Pennsylvania, and New Jersey, the mother work has been expanded in all the important lines. The New Jersey Congress at its last annual meeting appointed a committee of investigation, hoping by a campaign of education to control or correct some present conditions. The Pennsylvania Congress has done effective work to reduce infant mortality, and the New York Assembly of Mothers has endorsed the single standard of morality for men and women. The marriage bill presented by Mrs. E. H. Merrell, State chairman of child hygiene organization, has been pushed in Delaware by Mrs. George W. Marshall, the philanthropic State president. In Texas, the Mothers' Congress movement has developed amazingly under the direction of Mrs. J. N. Porter of Dallas, temperance worker and home protector.

The 1911 National Convention at Washington focused attention on such vital topics as Education for Parenthood; the Relation of the Home, the School and the Church to Child Welfare; the Duty of the State and the Nation to the Children; Plans for Erring, Dependent and Working Children, etc.

The Religious Education Society had charge of a session devoted to religious training, with special reference to parents as religious teachers.

The world-wide aspect of the movement was reflected in the addresses by representatives from abroad and reports from the great World's Home Education Congress held in Belgium last year. Memorial services were held for the departed leaders, Mrs. James H. McGill, of Washington, national corresponding secretary, and Mrs. W. W. Murphy, of Los Angeles, national vice-president for California, able and consecrated workers.

WASHINGTON'S GOSPEL MISSION

THE past year has been one of progress for the Gospel Mission in Washington. The location is strikingly adapted to the work in hand, for the neighborhood is far from a choice one. There are several drinking saloons and "speak-easies" nearby. Here many of the denizens of the under world consort with the children of darkness and give to this particular section a name which has made it notorious throughout the city.

To offset the conditions of the surroundings the Mission was organized five years ago by a few Christian men who had much experience in rescue work; it has been a success from its inception.

The experience of the workers has been similar to that of other missions. The demand for a place where the "down and outs" could secure baths, clean beds, employment, etc., became pressing, and so two large dormitories were fitted up with cots and bedding, shower baths and toilets; a heating plant installed and everything provided to make men comfortable.

An industrial department was organized, where men and boys could earn an honest living while becoming established as Christians and getting in shape to return to their homes or to seek permanent employment. A team was purchased, a paper baler secured, and hundreds of tons of newspapers and magazines collected, baled and shipped to paper mills, the proceeds of which supported in part the men engaged in the work.

A penny lunch was furnished where men and boys of very small incomes could secure a cup of coffee, a roll, a plate of bean soup or something similar for a penny each, or a good "substantial" meal for five cents. The patronage extended to this institution has been phenomenal and far exceeded the highest expectations of the managers of the Mission.

A penny bundle kindling wood plant was equipped which furnishes work to the unskilled and at the same time reduces the cost of kindling wood to the poor from one to three cents per bundle.

The primary object of the mission, however, and its principal business, has been to uphold Christ to the lost that they may be drawn unto him, and so a Gospel service is held every night in the year in the hall on Pennsylvania Avenue, which is attended by large and interested audiences; the Gospel is presented and many men and women have yielded their lives to the service of Christ.

Among the many cases of men rescued is that of a man who was a professional burglar and who had served time in the penitentiary. Two years ago last fall, he came to Washington to ply his vocation, and in order to hide from the police he sought shelter in the Gospel Mission dormitories, the inmates of which are required to attend the religious services. There he heard all about the power of Jesus to redeem men who were enslaved to sin and there he heard the testimony of men who had been set free from their bondage. After going up to the dormitory one night at the conclusion of the evening Gospel meeting under deep conviction, he heard some of the workers pouring out their souls to God in prayer for a seeker down in the chapel and he could no longer resist. He descended to the chapel, fell on his knees and cried out, "Pray for me, I am a lost man." God heard his prayer and the prayers of the faithful workers, and pardoned his sins and applied the cleansing blood, and the burglar became a child of God, a new creature in Christ.

Gospel Mission Hall, Washington

Meetings are held nightly in this hall at which many erring souls are brought to repentance and salvation

Mrs. John Hay, widow of the former Secretary of State, has rendered possible a permanent home for the Gospel Mission by giving $5,000 for the purpose. The old District building, at 214-216 John Marshall Place, was purchased by the Gospel Mission Association for $25,000.

The building is 56 by 125 feet, covering the entire lot, to the alley. It contains sixty large apartments, all well lighted and heated. It is a well-built structure, all the dividing walls being brick. Work will at once begin on the necessary repairs and alterations, and as early as possible the Gospel Mission will be domiciled in its new home, where the enlarged accommodations will greatly extend its usefulness.

A kitchen and a dining room, apartments hitherto unknown in the building, will be installed, together with store-rooms and pantries. A reception room, reading room, and hall for religious services will be on the first floor. On the upper floors will be the sleeping rooms, linen rooms, and baths.

From fall until spring each year the Washington Bread Line has been maintained by the Gospel Mission, furnishing thousands of men a pint of steaming hot coffee and rolls at six A.M. daily, enabling them to start out upon the day's labors, doing odd jobs or searching for employment without an excuse to go to the saloon.

The employment agency has secured permanent work for many, while the industrial department is enabled to bridge over many a man in want. Families are aided when in financial distress or when sickness and death visit their homes. In fact the Gospel Mission does a general work of mercy among the poor and destitute of Washington.

Dr. Louis Klopsch, the late and greatly beloved editor and proprietor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, was a frequent contributor to the Gospel Mission from its inception to the time of his death. His portrait occupies a prominent place on the wall of the Mission hall, being suspended over the platform.

Tragedies of the Chinese Famine

THE MULTITUDE OF FAMINE REFUGEES WAITING OUTSIDE A TEMPLE GATE FOR RELIEF DISTRIBUTION

OUR photograph on this page presents one of the most extraordinary scenes in connection with the famine in China. This picture, which was taken by one of the missionaries and forwarded to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, shows a portion of the great refugee camp outside of Chin-kiang. There were at one time not less than 30,000 human beings in this aggregation of misery, all of them having wandered far from their homes in mid-winter in the hope of finding food and shelter. Since the present famine began there have been several large migratory movements of this character, in which the hopeless multitudes have passed from one section of the country to another, each procession leaving a line of dead and dying in its wake. Such a movement in famine times illustrates in grim fashion the principle of the "survival of the fittest," for it is only the stronger men and women and the more robust children that can come through such an ordeal alive. Our good missionaries write us that hundreds of thousands of sufferers like those in the picture are being supported at the cost of less than a cent a day per head!

Fortunately, the end of this long-continued suffering cannot now be far off. In the latter part of May the first wheat harvest is due. Should no misfortune befall the crop meanwhile, with that harvest the suffering will be greatly abated.

Rev. James B. Webster, treasurer of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Missionary Committee in Chin-kiang, writes that the missionaries are now redoubling their efforts in the relief work. Missionary Mark B. Grier of the Presbyterian Mission at Hsucheofu, has taken in over 400 famine babies. They are being fed on milk. He is arranging to feed 2,600 families and may possibly take on 2,000 more and carry them through until the first harvest, late in May.

Mr. E. C. Lobenstine writes from Shanghai: "We have on the list of the Relief Committee in four magistracies of Anhui, over 300,000 persons. These are being supported at the rate of a fraction of a cent a day. How they manage to live is a mystery. Imperfect as has been our work, it has undoubtedly resulted in a large saving of life." He adds that no attempt has been made to undertake industrial work, one reason being that the concentration of people huddled together in famine camps would be favorable to the spread of famine fever.

Mr. Lobenstine sends this touching incident:

A few li from here lived a family of eight, father and mother, two married sons and two grandchildren. Having nothing to live on and unable to support themselves by begging, they were, along with ten thousands of others, reduced to the point of starving. Not many days ago, the eldest son's wife said to her husband and her parents-in-law: "Take me and sell me. It is not right that we should all perish, if by selling me you can live. I am quite ready to be sold as a slave." But the other daughter broke in, saying: "Not so, my sister; you have children while I have none, and you are the wife of the elder son; it is your place to stay by your family. Let them take me rather and sell me. And then, if heaven saves your lives and fortune changes for the better, my husband can take to him another wife better than myself, who will be an honor to the family and raise up children for him." But they were a united family and could not resign themselves to the parting. So the father spoke up and said: "We have still a few stalks of corn left; let us take them to the city and sell them for a few cash. Perhaps that will keep us alive till the Relief Committee makes its distribution; but if die we must, let us die together." The son carried the cornstalks to the city, and received in return 200 cash (eight cents, gold) with which he bought a little food. But, as you know, the bank has been slow in getting the copper coins to us, and it has not been possible to make our first distribution of one hundred cash per person (which would have kept them alive for a few days longer), and yesterday the report came that the entire family was dead. Wives and even children over ten are being daily sold as slaves, and not only is it not considered wrong to buy them, but he who does so is looked upon as a benefactor. Smaller children are given away for a few cents, or a few ounces of bread, or even left to die by the roadside. Three or four days ago, a woman passed out of the west gate of the city not far from here, carrying a baby in her arms. She had tried to beg, but both she and her babe were gradually starving to death. She had tried to give the child away, but could find no one to take it, for it was young and weak and would almost surely die. She had made up her mind to expose it by the roadside among the grave mounds, but when it came to doing so, her heart failed her and she could not. Seeing her plight, and reading in her face her story, a passerby snatched the child from her arms and carried it off amongst the graves, while another turned the half-dead woman back toward the city, there to try to save herself from death. God only knows how many thousands of others have passed through the same anguish during the past two months, and how many tens of thousands must pass that way.

Several of the missionaries write describing minor tragedies of the famine; people staggering from weakness and falling dead in the streets; bodies, some of them half eaten by dogs, found in the morning, the victims having died of sheer starvation in the night; famine sufferers applying for work and collapsing at the beginning from weakness; and the prevalence of unnaturally bloated features, the usual forerunner of death from famine. One of the difficulties experienced by missionaries in the relief work is that, however they may try to use wise discrimination, they find it unsafe to give to one what they cannot extend to all. Should they endeavor to relieve a particularly unfortunate case with a special supply of food thousands of other sufferers in the district immediately rush forward with importunate demands and will not be refused.

There is now a more hopeful aspect in the plague situation than at any time since it began its course in Manchuria. It is the opinion of the international medical staff that it has been effectually limited and that there is now little danger of its spreading. The death-roll, however, has been an appalling one. The doctors have worked heroically, risking their lives at every turn for the sake of science and humanity. Among those who have been most active are the American, English, and Russian physicians. Dr. Paul Haffkine worked at Harbin in the plague hospital amid hourly peril. Dr. Anna Sniezshikoff, one of his assistants, succumbed to the plague. Drs. Aspland and Stenhouse were among the foreigners who did special service in the Peking hospitals. Dr. Wu Lien De, a native Chinese physician of great experience, with three European volunteers, had charge of the work in Fu Chia Dien, the worst plague centre in all Manchuria. An elderly Chinese doctor with one native assistant attended 1,600 plague victims in the hospital at Harbin and came through the ordeal unscathed. Unfortunately, few of the patients recovered, as the treatment was that of the antiquated Chinese medical school.

We would remind our readers that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S China Famine Relief Fund will close on May 15, after which date no contributions will be received. Intending contributors should make an effort to send in their offerings during the present week, in order that the final remittance by cable to the Relief Committees may be as large as possible.

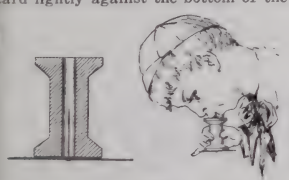
not call him a hypocrite; for if there is a true man on the face of the earth it is your father-in-law." I never heard such bitter things said against a man. It was cruel and unjust. When the will of the man was read, it was seen that he had made no difference, but treated all alike. But they despised his love. Mother, how would you like to have your boy treat you in that way? How would you feel, father? Isn't that a faint picture of God's love? You can spurn the love of God, you can despise it, you can make light of it; but I want to tell you—and I hope the Holy Ghost will burn it down into your heart—that God loves you, and loves you in spite of your meanness and your sins. You can lock the door of your heart and bar and double-bar it and keep the love of God out; or you can open the door and let the love of God in. Which will you do? There is nothing to hinder you. Is it the devil's lie that you believe? God is love! God is love! Let us all say it, louder; every one who believes it now, say it. I wish we could drive the old lie out to perdition; the old lie that "God is not love."

I was building a house in Chicago for workingmen and a business man said, "I would like to put up a text on the wall that you are building." I agreed and supposed he simply wanted to put up a motto or fresco. I found a gas-man working back of the pulpit. "What are you doing there?" I asked. It was in gas-jets, and to my amazement it was "God is love!" They could not light the church without lighting that text, and for years I stood with that text back of me—"God is love." His thought was to burn it into the hearts of the people. One night, a man was going by and he saw the text, "God is love," and he said, "God is not love." But there was the text, a burning assertion of the everlasting truth that "God is love." By and by, the man came back and looked at the gas-jet again. I saw the man go in and sit down by the door, and before I knew it, he had his hands up to his face. Once in a while I would see tears run down. I was interested, foolishly thinking that it was due to my preaching. I got down by the door before he went out, and I said, "What's the trouble?" He said confusedly, "I don't know." When God gets hold of a man, he can't always tell what it means. Some men are cross and ugly to their wives; others fight with men, fight the church members, fight with the ungodly. I went into the pew with this particular man and I said, "What is the sermon that made you cry?" but he said he didn't even know that I had been preaching, and didn't know anything about the sermon. I was floored. Well, was it something that had been read? Was it anything in the songs? He couldn't remember anything in the songs. "What is the matter?" I urged insistently. He glanced upward and said, "That text up there!" I said, "Man, believe God loves you." He said, "I ain't worth loving. "That's true," I said. "But he love you all the same." And I sat there half an hour and we got it down into his soul and I had reason afterward to know that divine grace wrought it wondrous work in him and he became a new man.

Let us all say these blessed words together once again by way of benediction—"God is Love."

OUR BOYS' AND GIRLS' COZY CORNER



I Thank You All

DEAR BOYS AND GIRLS: We are not saying much about flags in the Cozy Corner this week, but our Editor has asked me to call the attention of our boys and girls to page 466 of this issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and I trust you are going to enjoy your flags as much as I enjoy thinking of each of my boys and girls with OLD GLORY as a friend and companion. I would rather have my own Old Glory than almost anything else in the world. It is so really a friend.

An Interesting Trick

TAKE an empty spool and a small calling card. Put a pin through the centre of the card, and hold the card lightly against the bottom of the spool. Then blow through the spool. So far from being blown off, the card will be sucked up so that it will stick to the spool when you take your hand away, but will drop off as soon as you stop blowing against it.

This Week's Contest

BE SURE to answer the contest this week. You will have lots of fun puzzling it out, I am sure. The verses are taken from Miss Bancroft's delightful book called Games.

All the fun consists in filling out the ends of each line with a double letter of the alphabet, as indicated in verse 1.

To the boys and girls finishing the greatest number of lines correctly we will send special Cozy Corner prizes, and their names shall be published on the May Honor Roll.

A Good Outdoor Game

FOX AND GEESE can be played with anywhere from ten to forty players. One boy is chosen to be the Fox, and one to be the Gander. The other players all stand single file behind the gander, each with his hands on the shoulders of the next in front. To open the game, the Fox shouts, "Geese, geese, ganno!" The geese answer, "Fox, fox, fanno!"

Fox: "How many geese have you to-day?"

Gander: "More than you can carry away."

Then the chase begins. The Fox should try his best to catch the goose on the end of the line. The Gander does all he can to prevent the Fox from catching that goose. When more than ten are playing the game, the last five players may be tagged by the Fox. The fun lies in the geese all co-operating with the Gander to prevent the last goose from being tagged. The line must not be broken.

A Prize Winner in "Something I Have Made Myself" Contest

A HONEY-BOX, a shingle, some cord, two pins and a fair-sized tin can are the only materials necessary

"Long may it wave
O'er the land of the free and the home of the brave."

for making this successful steam-engine.

To make the wheel, cut two pieces of wood from the honey-box about one inch long, one quarter inch wide, and not more than one-eighth thick. Cut a notch in each piece (see fig. 2); fit the two pieces together (see fig. 3), and hammer a pin firmly in each side. From the shingle cut two pieces of wood in proportion (see fig. 1), and bore a small hole represented by dotted lines (A).

Place the pin-heads in the holes in the side pieces, being sure that they turn easily. The pins and the wheel revolve together, and it is a simple matter to attach a pulley to run like machinery.

Puncture two very small holes in the lid just under the ends of the paddles. Set the can on the stove and fill it half full of water.

Souvenirs to You All

SO MANY Cozy Corner boys and girls answered the careless biographer's mistakes successfully that it would be impossible to publish all the names. But Cozy Corner souvenirs were promptly sent to all, and if any one was overlooked and did not receive the Good Times Reprint, besides the Souvenir Post Cards, be sure to write and ask for it, because you will like it.

The correct answer of the Topsy-Turvy verse in the Cozy Corner of April 5 is

The milkman brings the eggs,
The grocer brings the tea,
But bring, pretty fairies, bring
The dreams that go to bed with me.

A Narrow Escape

Prize-winner in recent contest

THE game was on. With two fellows out, the Cressville boys were desperate. It was the last half of the ninth inning, and the score was 5 to 2 in favor of the Mellville team.

"For the last six years Cressville has held the championship! Are we going to let those fellows take it away from us?"

"Not if I can help it," said Bob Baker, the Captain of the team.

"Jerry Hopkins up to bat," called the Umpire.

"Now do something," yelled Bob. "Ned is on third, knock him in." But it was not to be thus. Jerry was given a walk, as was also the man that batted right after him. Bob Baker was now at the bat.

"Strike one," called the Umpire.

"Strike two," and the Cressville fans began to groan.

The next ball was right over. Bob struck at it. Whack! The ball was sent flying to right field. Bob skinned to the bases as fast as he could, and started home.

"Slide, slide!" yelled the coach. Bob slid to the home base, and the game was won, 6 to 5.

FRANK M. COLLEY, age 11.

So Many Good Things

ANY one who has not already written to the Aunt of the Cozy Corner, be sure to write and introduce yourself.

I very especially want to know every boy and girl, big and little, older and younger, in the homes where THE CHRISTIAN HERALD goes. Your letters will all be answered promptly.

I am planning so many good things for you all that I do not want a single boy or girl left out.

Our Good-Night Verse

Lord is the strength of my life;
whom shall I be afraid?

Lovingly and faithfully yours,

THE AUNT IN THE COZY CORNER

QUEEN OF THE MAY

(See illustration on first page)

CROWN of the year is the beautiful May,
With its starry blooms and its lambs at play,
And the children laughing the livelong day.

While down in the vale rings the robin's trill;
And the hermit thrush and the whip-poorwill
Hold twilight concerts over the hill.

And playing the shepherdess, fair and tall,
A maiden comes at the springtime's call,
And the white lambs follow her, one and all.

For sweeter her voice than the linnet's lay,
And brighter her eyes than the shining day,
And all hearts hail her the Queen of the May.

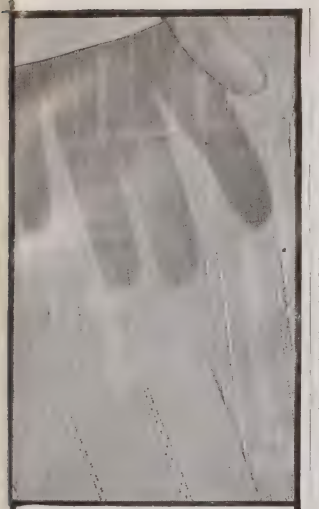
Korea Needs Missionaries

A MISSIONARY at Mokpo, Korea, writes: "Recently I sent you something about our campaign for a million souls in Korea. I hope campaigns for winning souls all over the world may be inaugurated until a great, world-wide revival, united and simultaneous, is begun. The Word of God, read, studied and published abroad until it is in every home and heart and life, must bring a mighty transformation throughout the whole world.

"The Southern Presbyterian Mission in Korea is asking for reinforcements urgently needed this year; six ministers, three men for educational work, two physicians, three trained nurses, four single women for evangelistic and educational work, one teacher for industrial work, and one architect and practical builder. Dr. S. H. Chester, or Dr. James O. Reavis, secretaries of the executive committee of Foreign Missions, First National Bank Building, Nashville, Tenn., will give applicants all information. Please help us in this work, and may a rich reward be upon THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for all that our heavenly Father is using it to accomplish in his kingdom.

"I recall a visit made to the Bowery Mission while in America one cold night, and the work of relief there witnessed was a help to me to go forward and do more for our fellow men."



Federation of Gospel Missions

THE National Federation of Gospel Missions will hold its annual Convention in Washington, D. C., May 8 to 14. This organization, in the foundation of which THE CHRISTIAN HERALD was actively interested, now includes practically all the best known Rescue and Gospel Missions in the country. Its officers are men and women actively engaged in various lines of mission work. At the Convention, addresses will be made by the superintendents of a number of the leading missions. A reception is being arranged for the delegates, who will visit the President of the United States. A part of the programme will be the holding of memorial services in honor of Jerry McAuley, the founder of rescue mission work, Colonel G. R. Clark of the Pacific Garden Mission, Chicago, S. H. Hadley, Charles N. Crittenton, Dr. Louis Klopsch, "the friend of all Rescue Mission work," and John S. Huyler, founder of the Hadley Hall Mission, New York.

A Great Sermon

I wish to say that in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of April 5, the sermon by Rev. J. Wilbur Chapman, D.D., Luke 18: 37, "Jesus of Nazareth passeth by," is fully worth the whole year's subscription. It should, if possible, be published broadcast through the land.

OUR COMFORT CORNER

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

An Unhealed Wound

A MOTHER writes telling of the loss years ago of a dear little daughter. When the child was taken to the upper fold she was little more than a baby. If she were here to-day she would be a girl of eighteen. The mother has never ceased to grieve for her lost darling. More than this, she has allowed her grief to grow morbid, so that she looks with envy at mothers whose children are with them, and turns away when she meets girls who are at the age her child would have been had she been spared. The unhealed wound has become a chronic sore, and it almost seems as if this mother does not wish to be comforted. There is little use to say to such a one: "Your dear child is safe from the perils that beset us who are here; she is immune from sickness; she can never have a heartache such as yours; she is in the house above not made with hands, the eternal home of God's dear children." She has so long hugged her sorrow that instead of its being a familiar friend it has become a haunting foe. What she needs is to ask of God this gift: submission to his will. So long as she remains in rebellion she will continue to be desperately unhappy. Then she should say to herself, "Have I the right to make others wretched because I am deprived of what I most prize in the world?" By persistently trying to be cheerful and by avoidance of the topic that has taken precedence of every other, she may yet emerge from the cloud and walk in the sunshine.

A mother who grieved in this way told me that there came to her suddenly, without an instant's warning, another great sorrow which was also a great shock. She said, "Something gave way within me, and I knew that I had been wrong, and that my better self must come to the front. My weakness left me, and in an instant I was strong, but at what a price!" Pray for submission to the will of God, and show love to those who remain, is the advice to give to those who suffer from an unhealed wound.

"WHAT am I to do with my Mary?" This is the cry of a bewildered mother who cannot see a step before her. Mary is seventeen, a beautiful age, an age when a girl is an unfolding rose-bud. The rose-bud at this stage is even prettier than the rose in bloom. "Mary has always been the dearest and sweetest of girls," the mother declares; "but she has lately lost her head over a lad of the neighborhood, the son of a common family whom we consider below us in social station. There is nothing to be said against the boy himself, but his parents, though in comfortable circumstances, are foreigners, and we think illiterate. If Mary does not give up her absorption in this Leopold, life for me will not be worth living. The more I fight against this obsession, the more she seems determined to hold fast to Leo."

To this mother I would say, you have gone about the business in the wrong way, as far too many women do in similar conditions. If you did not wish your Mary to care too much for this boy, you should have given him free entrance to your home, inviting other young people there, and putting no emphasis on the boy-and-girl friendship by strenuous opposition. Probably it is a little late to repair the mischief, if mischief it be. Still, they are both very young, and you might arrange a visit for Mary away from home. If there is nothing to be said against the boy himself, if he is honest, manly and likely to do a man's work in the world, you have no right to turn from him because you look upon his family as common. As foreigners, they may seem to you illiterate, while in reality they may take pride in their country and ancestry and may be acquainted with three or four languages, and be anything except ignorant. In a republican country nobody should look down upon neighbors, nor is it quite permissible for any of us to stigmatize worthy folk as common.

The Moslem Women of To-day

WHOEVER has read the exquisite descriptions of harem life as they appear in the novels of Pierre Loti has received an impression of soft luxury, flowers, perfume, feasting, indolence, and the general atmosphere of the land where it is always afternoon. Beneath the languor and the luxury there always lurks the possibility of tragedy. Turkish women, highly educated, speaking and reading two or three European languages, skilled in music and supplied with every detail of European dress, if they choose to wear it in the seclusion of their imprisoned life, have, according to the French novelist, everything to live for except freedom and love. They have no liberty, and the love they inspire is not a satisfaction to the soul of woman. Other stories of Turkish life appear from time to time, always depicting a life of dreams behind barred windows and closed doors. Kipling's lines come back to us as we think of the Moslem woman:

> Oh, East is East, and West is West,
> And never the twain shall meet,
> Till earth and sky stand presently
> At God's great judgment seat.

Notwithstanding the truth of this familiar stanza in its bearing upon Eastern and Western civilization, there is another truth of which we cannot lose sight. Woman remains feminine in every age and under every sky. Mohammedan women and Oriental women in general have the capacity for love and the capacity for suffering common to their sisters in Christian lands, the legacy to the race of our mother Eve. It is interesting to note that in the twentieth century a change, gradual but inevitable, is coming in the standards and ideals of the East, a change so imperceptible as hardly to be recognized at first, and yet so radical that it has already actually modified the ancient dress and brought to the ladies of the harem the occasional privilege of appearing in public with their husbands, or of being seen in groups together out of doors unveiled. The veil of an Eastern woman, it must be remembered, is not the filmy bit of gauze or lace of which we think when we use the word. It is very much more like a great opaque sheet which is a complete protection to face and form, in which there are apertures for the eyes, but which is otherwise a shield beyond the penetration of any onlooker. Rebekah's veil in the old days was of this shape and texture. The veil in which Ruth of Moab carried home six measures of barley to the waiting Naomi was also no doubt a great sheet, and in the American version of the Scriptures it is fitly spoken of as a mantle.

The education of Europe and America will before very long be given to Turkish girls, a few of whom have already entered the American College at Constantinople. The twin forces of education and Christianity are at work.

How to End Floor Troubles

You can make a natural wood floor tough, mar-proof and durable. You can protect a painted floor, and make old paint look new. You can double the life of oilcloth or linoleum.

All this by coating the floor with Elastica Floor Finish, and there is no other way.

The result is a floor finish which hard usage doesn't mar—heels nor casters don't mark. Water cannot turn it white. It doesn't need constant replacing like wax. It doesn't lose its newness like brittle floor finish.

Elastica is needed on every uncarpeted floor, old or new. You will always use it, and end all your floor troubles, when you once know what it does.

The Secret is This

We have worked out a way to combine in Elastica, with the other ingredients, a large percentage of properly treated oil. Thus the varnish is made extremely tough and elastic, yet the oil is so treated that the varnish dries quickly and hard.

The secret of making is ours alone. It is the result of 40 years spent in the making of varnish.

Many thousands of people have found that Elastica meets all their ideas of a floor finish. It is sure to meet yours.

GIUSEPPE'S FRIEND

By GRACE BOTELER SANDERS

"PEOPLE are going mad about advertising. It's perfect foolishness the way you are carrying on!" snapped Mrs. Warwick. "If you keep on this way a few more months, we won't have any business to advertise."

Rolfe Warwick, the tall young son, looked from the balcony with a satisfied smile. He knew, if his mother did not, that the past six months had been remarkable because of almost doubled sales; consequently he could afford to listen patiently.

"I said nothing when you wanted to enlarge this room, though I thought it unnecessary," continued Mrs. Warwick fretfully, "but this last caper is one too many. Flowers, greenhouse roses to be given away as souvenirs at ten cents apiece and music by the Cadet orchestra! Who ever heard tell of the like! I only saw the paper thirty minutes ago and came right down. I really believe you are losing your senses, Rolfe."

But as the irate woman looked up into the face of her tall young son, the frowns left her. In spite of her vexation, she could not keep from smiling when she looked into his father's eyes. He was a handsome young man and an intelligent, energetic one. He had been at the head of his classes in an Eastern college and the admiration of the children and the girls. He had been brought up in idleness, but there was a germ of bravery beneath the seemingly thoughtless exterior. When he was called home suddenly by the death of his father, and when he learned that a dingy little drug store on one of the principal streets of Silver City was the only fortune his mother possessed, he resolutely set to work to mend their tattered fortunes. So far as managing the store, he had been successful. Mrs. Warwick, elegantly dressed, exquisite, was obliged to admit that the Corner Pharmacy was a different place from that which her son had taken charge of twelve months before.

For a thoughtful moment she sat looking about her. The sharp click-click of the boot-heels of half a dozen clerks snapped briskly across the blue and white tiled floor. A crowd of people stood before the counter. The soda fountain, posts and ceiling were adorned with festoons of bright-hued flowers. A company of musicians were tuning their instruments in a palm-bordered alcove. It was a cheery, inspiring scene.

"These openings are not an uncommon thing in the large cities," her son's voice broke in on the critical survey. "Why, in New York——"

"New York!" Mrs. Warwick interrupted him by these words in exclamation points, and an impatient shrug of the shoulders. "New York and Silver City are two different places. What will a town of smelter folks care for flowers and classical music? You've wasted your money, Rolfe. I see now that I've given you too free a rein. I never will do it again."

The sudden appearance of a bright-faced black boy in a white coat cut short the tirade. The boy carried a brown earthen jar filled with American Beauty roses. They nodded their rosy, fragrant heads proudly as they filled the room with their spicy odor. It floated up to the woman on the balcony and blended with the strains of music, seeming to form a concert of harmony. Behind this boy came another boy and another jar and more roses. A sandwich of flowers, pink and white, and a procession of black boys in white coats marched proudly to the front showcase, centre aisle, and carefully placed the brown jars on the yellow mats which had been prepared for them. The orchestra began to play very softly, "Hearts and Flowers." Even the mother was silenced by the beauty and by the crowd.

Mrs. Warwick sat with wide-open eyes, watching the people who were flocking through the open doors. Young girls, newsboys, business men, faded matrons, jarred against each other in their effort to reach the centre aisle, where the grinning black boys in white coats were handing out the long-stemmed pink-and-white buds. Several men with grimy faces, men with work-scarred hands, who wore tattered overalls, crowded to the front with the others to receive their flowers. Wonderingly the woman on the balcony watched their faces lighten as they pinned the flowers to their coats or protected them by a sheet of paper before going out into the chill spring wind.

She noticed, too, with much pleasure and surprise, that almost every person who received a flower sought some department of the store. Many left it with their arms filled with bundles. The ice-cream tables were crowded. The clerks at the soda fountain were busy. The music, now gay, now grave, filled the air with sweetness. The people of the little mining town, who heard so little good music, lingered as if they could not bear to leave. And still the crowd came.

In the temporary lull between selections, a girl's voice floated up to the balcony from a table below. "Order something else, Lil. I haven't the nerve to sit here unless I am eating, and I can't leave yet. I don't want to miss one strain of that lovely music." Mrs. Warwick leaned over to look for the owner of the grating voice, and saw a factory girl decked out in a tawdry red satin waist trimmed with cheap lace. Her hair was elaborately curled and puffed. Her hat was loaded down with feathers and flowers, and her rough red hands, adorned by rings and bangles, kept time to the music. "Ain't it heavenly?" she repeated. "It makes me feel different in here." One hand sought her heart.

"And to think of that girl appreciating Wagner!" groaned Mrs. Warwick, looking for her son. But he was gone. She saw him far across the store, solicitously bending over a grotesque old figure. It was an old woman, evidently of foreign birth. She wore her native costume, a short red skirt and blue stuff waist. The home-knit stockings wrinkled over the tops of her heavy shoes. Her face was weather-beaten and brown and crinkled as an autumn leaf which had been brushed by the lips of the frost. Her eyes burned fiercely. The wisps of iron-gray hair which strayed from beneath the red-checkered shoulder shawl which she wore over her head, gave her an almost witch-like appearance. She was gesticulating and talking loudly, and Mrs. Warwick noticed, when Rolfe went to the prescription desk for an order, that the old woman shook her fist vindictively at his retreating figure. And still the crowd jostled each other in their effort to reach the centre aisle, where the fragrant flowers stood. There was but one perfect white rose left in the last jar.

Just as the boy was about to hand it to a little girl, she saw Rolfe hold up a restraining hand. With the rose and a bottle of medicine Rolfe Warwick returned to the old woman. With the bottle, he smilingly presented the flower. An instantaneous change swept over the face of the curious customer. She burst out into a flood of thanks, bowed her head over the young man's hand as if to kiss it, then with another torrent of thanks she whirled and hurried from the store.

It was an hour before Rolfe Warwick returned. The flowers were gone. The music was over, but the

You think of Quality when you think of K-R-I-T

You may forget the price—but never the Quality

WHEN you buy a small car you demand not one whit less service from it than you demand from a large car. Indeed, because it is so much more convenient, so much easier on tires, so much more economical, so much more "ready"—you are likely to exact much more service from it than from a car of larger size.

And because its first cost is less, or for some other unknown reason, experience has shown that such cars usually receive less attention—less car. All this points definitely and directly to ONE conclusion, to wit:

If high Quality and good workmanship are prime essentials in a big car, they are DOUBLY IMPORTANT in an every-day service car like the K-R-I-T.

That's why we continually emphasize K-R-I-T Quality. It's important to you.

The K-R-I-T is not a large car, neither is it a small car. It has all the efficiency and easy riding qualities of a well-built large car, equal roominess, comfort and style. It also has the compactness, flexibility and low operating cost of a small car. Yet it is neither one nor the other, but stands just between the two classes—is in a class by itself.

The K-R-I-T is the highest quality car of its price and size built.

This is a bold claim and demands proof. This is just exactly what we would like to submit. We have not space enough here to more than suggest that you investigate the K-R-I-T before you spend a dollar in an automobile. The K-R-I-T Catalogue explains the K-R-I-T quality features in detail and describes the full line, including the K-R-I-T Fore-Door at $830, and the wonderfully stylish, speedy, classy K-R-I-T Understung at $1200, and other K-R-I-T models.

store was filled with shoppers. "What do you think of my experiment now?" he beamed, nodding across the way to the other drug store, which was empty. "They haven't had a customer to-day. We have been busy as could be. You thought the smelter folks didn't care for music and flowers, but you see you were mistaken. I have more than taken in enough to pay expenses already. I'm not sorry I tried it; are you, mother?"

"That was a curious looking old woman to whom you were talking." Rolfe looked at his mother quickly.

"That was old Mag—crazy Mag, some call her—and I declare she acted like she was crazy to-day. Her son's family have had a great deal of trouble since they came here. A year ago, they had a sick child and sent a prescription which the doctor gave them, to Tuttle's to have it filled. The clerk made a mistake, gave them some sort of a poison, and the baby died. They'd heard so much talk about Americans hating foreigners, that Guglielmo's people made up their minds that it was done to rid the country of the Italians. They swore vengeance on the Americans, and since that it's hardly safe for a medical man to go on that side of town. The feeling's been pretty intense lately. The superintendent told me yesterday that there'd been a good deal of suffering from diphtheria in the Italian quarter. They kept it a secret as long as they could for fear of being quarantined, and the result has been that a great many children died. Old Mag's grandson, Giuseppe, seems to have it now.

"Without the knowledge of his parents she started out to get some medicine for him. The orchestra happened to strike up an old Italian hymn just as she went by, and that drew her in. She was telling me how homesick it made her. When she spoke of medicine I knew antitoxine was the only thing that would help the child. She only had a few pennies, so I gave her the medicine and the rose, too. Poor old soul! She was so happy! I'd feel repaid if this day hadn't accomplished another thing than to brighten her hard, unhappy lot."

Mrs. Warwick's lip curled, but she said no more. Drawing her wraps about her, she bade her son good-by and hurried from the store. But old Mag had gone. Her aching old heart had been cheered by the young man's words and kindly smile. Tender memories surged through her brain with the strains of music. The white rose carefully protected from the fitful gusts, she hurried hopefully along, thinking of home and Giuseppe and her son, the proud leader of the Italian secret society, which numbered five thousand strong. She was proud of her son because of the masterly way he led the other men in the settlement, because he was so brave and true. She had heard the men, only night before last, planning how they would destroy not only the medical men, but the druggists who were selling the poisons which were driving their people into the grave. She heard their oaths and vindictive threats. "We'll grind down our oppressors!" one dark, excitable fellow had shouted. She could hear him now. "Our superintendent and these rich men enjoy luxuries while we starve. We are helpless. We dare not resist these officials. We must do their dirty work and let these foreign doctors kill our children. But wait!" The young man had held up a finger commandingly. Old Mag had seen him all the way to the store—that beautiful place where the flowers and music greeted her.

She had not thought a great deal of it then; she had believed him right. Now the repeated words made even her stout old heart quail. "If another child dies between now and May Day, the idle rich, the medicine men, must pay the penalty with their property and their lives." In vivid contrast she now saw Rolfe Warwick's smiling face and heard his kind voice as he pressed the pennies back into her hand.

"Keep the pennies, Auntie; you may need them for something else. I'm glad to give you the medicine for the little Giuseppe. He's a fine little lad, and I hope he will soon be well. Take him the flower, and tell him I sent it—Rolfe Warwick—he'll remember me, and when he is well, tell him to come down to the store and I'll fix up the best soda for him that this store can make."

Pondering over these words, old Mag passed St. Joseph's church just as the bell began to toll—one, two, three—yes, eight strokes. It was for little Antonio, whom she had heard gasping for breath. He was dead. No more would he and Giuseppe romp together on the streets or in Winter's Alley. Old Mag's heart failed her, not because she sorrowed for the child, but because she saw the defiant young Italian and heard his voice, "Just one more death, and these people must pay the penalty by their property and their lives!" Before, she had not cared; she thought they deserved it; but now, shining out like a star amid a crowd made up of baser metal, Mag saw the face of Rolfe Warwick, Giuseppe's friend.

She reached the tenement. In the hallway, she paused and listened to the wailing of the women. She pushed the door open softly. In the dim light she saw the child's mother walking the floor, sobbing and wringing her hands. Little Giuseppe lay on the bed, surrounded by a crowd of wailing women. He was beating the air with his small brown hands and fighting bravely for breath.

"He cannot even swallow water!" expostulated one woman when the grandmother motioned her aside. "It's no use to try. Don't give him that foreign stuff. Children are dying all around. Father Joseph says masses night and day. Don't bother Giuseppe. Light the candles to light his spirit away."

Old Mag rudely pushed her aside. She took the child in her arms and began her treatment. All evening, all night, the child's father and mother near, she fought the disease, and when the feeble sunlight flickered through Guglielmo's dirty windows, the little lad opened his eyes and smiled at the white rose which his grandmother had placed beside his bed. "So sweet," he murmured, "take! take!"

The grandmother held the fragrant thing to the child's nose. He kissed it feverishly. "Purty, so purty," he whispered, "where did you get the rose?"

"Nice gentleman sent it, nice man. He says he knows you are a nice little lad and when you get well he says he will give you the best soda in his store. He says his name is Rolfe Warwick. Do you know him?"

The little lad's face shone. "Does he say so?" he whispered proudly. "He is my friend."

All day the church bells rang. All day the frantic fathers and mothers counted their beads and prayed and called down curses on the medical men and the idle rich. Three days passed, and the fourth, on the night before May Day, the Italian order sought Guglielmo's quarters, an angry, black-faced crowd. Old Mag, sitting beside Giuseppe, who was playing with the faded rose, saw them and knew what it meant. The past few days had been days of horror for the inhabitants of "Little Italy." They had been eventful ones for the grandmother, the child and the parents. Giuseppe had been

Sunday School Lesson by Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

ISAIAH was the son of the prophet Amoz, or Amos. Amoz was a statesman-prophet, and uttered many strong words of warning to the Hebrew nation. His son Isaiah inherited his father's gifts. His activities occurred in the period between B.C. 758 and B.C. 697, so that he was in active service over sixty years. The three great world Powers at that time were Assyria, Babylon and Egypt. Rome had just been founded. The little land of Palestine was greater than any, though not one of the great Powers; for it was a God-power, and while the throne of its Jehovah King was in heaven, a temporal throne had been established in Jerusalem. The treasures to be preserved by Jehovah's people were a pure religion and a Messianic hope. The command of the Jehovah King had been that his people should have no lot nor share with the surrounding idolatrous nations, and neutrality was therefore urged by God's prophet Isaiah.

Isaiah's Remonstrance

There was great need for Isaiah's remonstrance, for on all sides he saw great commercial prosperity, which had been brought about by the complicity of God's people with the heathen nations. He also saw in the near distance the clouds of war, which meant their subjection and destruction. Isaiah said to the people: "I saw the Lord." He may not have seen God face to face, as Moses did at the door of the tabernacle, when God talked with him as a man speaketh with his friend (Ex. 33: 11); but Isaiah had a vision which brought him very near to God, and that vision was at the temple. God may have revealed himself to Isaiah as he did to Moses.

"Sitting upon a throne, . . . and his train filled the temple." Isaiah saw not only God, but the seraphim, the chiefest among the angelic host. And he heard their angel song in honor of their King. And he saw the glory of the King filling the temple, even as on the day of its dedication (I. Kings 8: 10, 11).

"And the foundations of the thresholds shook." It was like the sound of a great Amen reverberating through a church.

"And the house was filled with smoke," which was the spirit of praise, likened to the smoke of the incense upon the golden altar.

"Woe is me." From the height of vision to which Isaiah had been lifted, he looked down upon himself and upon his sinful nation, and exclaimed, "Unclean!" as a leper was accustomed to do, "for," said he, "mine eyes have seen the King!"

"Then flew one of the seraphim . . . a live coal in his hand . . . he touched my mouth with it . . . and said: Thine iniquity is taken away, and thy sin forgiven." The seraph had taken the coal from off the altar of sacrifice, it was therefore a symbol of God's forgiving love.

"Whom shall I send?" The Jehovah King was seeking an ambassador, that he might plead with his rebellious nation, and bring it back to fealty.

"Here am I, send me." Isaiah had been saved to serve. He was ready to prove his faith by his works.

"Make the heart of this people fat, . . . their ears heavy, . . . and shut their eyes." The King thus showed Isaiah that he had a difficult task before him. The very words of Isaiah would have the effect of covering the hearts of the people with the cloak of insensibility.

"How long?" Isaiah would have God tell him if it would always be so.

"Until cities be waste without inhabitant," etc. In fact, the downfall of Jerusalem and the captivity of Judah were but sixteen years ahead, and the King knew this, seeing all things from the beginning to the end.

"So the holy seed is the stock thereof." These words of encouragement were spoken by the King to Isaiah, that he might not lose heart, and think it was not worth his while to go and reprove his sinful nation. The Jehovah King in tender mercy compared them with two kinds of trees, the terebinth and the oak, which if cut down will spring up again and grow a new crown. So, while the words of Isaiah might not prevent the impending doom, they would give the people a chance, and would be something to think about when in captivity, and would help them upon their return to rebuild their nation in true godliness.

And now that we have become interested in Isaiah and his mission, we shall want to know what he did say to his people, and how he carried out the instructions given to him by the Jehovah King. This will therefore be the time to read the whole book of Isaiah. It can be read through fully and slowly in three hours; and it would better be read in three sittings of an hour each, rather than in small daily portions extending over several weeks. The words that occur oftenest we will find to be: Light, salvation, affliction, strength, darkness, peace, delight, ashamed, I will, righteousness, rock and rest.

A Home Missionary Lesson

This is the second title given to this lesson, and it well describes Isaiah's errand. His purpose was to make a better country there and then. Our purpose should be to make the United States a better country, here and now. We have thought much upon our national perils and hopes. Robert Browning said: "I hold not with the pessimist that all things are ill, nor with the optimist that all things are well. All things are not ill, and all things are not well; but all things shall be well, because this is God's world." We Americans are quite apt to speak of our land as "God's country." Certainly each one of us can help to make it so.

We have many of the same evils to combat that Isaiah had to blaze forth against in his land, as Sabbath desecration, drunkenness, irreligion, impurity, dishonesty, graft, brutality, lawlessness, etc. The list could be lengthened, but we desist. If any one doubts that these evils are darkening our American sky, let him take an envelope for each evil named, and for a month, or even for a week, keep watch of the daily newspapers, making clippings to place in the envelopes. We have seen a list more than one hundred feet long gathered by the members of a Sunday School class and their teacher, giving results of drunkenness alone.

As to Sabbath desecration: The American Sabbat' is wholly unlike that which our forefathers brought with them, when they spent the Sabbath on barren Clark's Island rather than make a landing on the mainland during the Sabbath. The Sabbath with us has come to be largely a day of social pleasure and self-indulgence. Dinner parties, card parties and receptions are given by many people who claim respectability; and indeed some of them are high up in the social order. Churches are not well attended. One pastor whom we know issued cards two months before Easter, to be signed by persons who would promise to attend church twice on Sunday, and the weekly prayer meeting, during that time, unless unavoidably detained.

Sunday School Lesson

The result was a large increase of attendance.

The Church and the Sunday School

Let Sunday School teachers take note how few of their scholars are ever seen at the church service. Why not? First, because they are not expected there. Many Sunday Schools are dismissed just as church is to begin, but the scholars, almost en masse, either go to their homes or wander through the streets, often playing by the way. Remedy: dismiss the school to the church, requesting all who are not going to attend church to remain in their seats until the others have passed out. Let certain parts of the church, perhaps the gallery, be set apart for the Sunday School, or let teachers take their scholars with them in their pews in case their parents do not attend the church. Undoubtedly the Men and Boys' Religion Forward Movement would not be so much needed as now if Sunday School scholars had been thus trained and helped to attend church. We rejoice that organized Sunday School work is to take a hand in that great movement, but four months yet remain before the opening of the campaign. Let the Sunday School begin now by inaugurating and helping church attendance in the two ways we have suggested.

"Whom shall I send and who will go for us?" "Here am I; send me." We are learning about Isaiah, that we may be as willing as he was to do the Lord's work. Mr. Marion Lawrence has said: "We are not doing the Lord's work; we are not even playing with it; for playing requires energy. We are only fooling with the Lord's work."

We have long had the motto as a slogan in Sunday School work: "All of the church in the Sunday School," and the result has been a large increase of attendance by adults. Let us now hear the motto: "All of the Sunday School in the church," and begin to work it now.

Rev. David Watson, in his book Social Problems and the Church's Duty, says: "We need both social reform and personal regeneration, a better social order and better men; but we shall attain neither unless we strive for both simultaneously. To safeguard and develop the individual, found the Christian home, and build the city of God—that is the work of the Christian Church."

It is stated that nearly sixty millions of dollars have thus far been spent by the United States Government in building dams and canals for the conservation of water and leading it where arid tracts and plains may be irrigated. Marvelous have been the results which are exhibited in pictures of plains once arid, now covered with beautiful orchards, yielding also grain, and vegetables of unusual size.

Home Missionary work may be considered a reclamation service for the plain dwellers and the regions beyond, not needed there alone, but in every part of our land, that in the end the fruits of the Spirit may be as abounding as those of the field.

A Hint for the Primary Teacher

In this lesson there is much that you can not present to little children, as seraphim and their shadowing wings, the coal taken from the altar and placed on the lips of Isaiah; but you can tell them that God sometimes chooses people to do errands for him, and that he did choose the prophet Isaiah to try to persuade the people who lived in Jerusalem and other places to quit their meanness and do the right. They can also be told, or can be led to speak themselves, about the bad things done in the places where they live. Teach them that God's messengers to make things better are the ministers, parents and teachers, and the good children who can help.

4 Ferns Given Away

To Christian Herald Readers

In Return for a Favor

If you want Ferns for your home, you can get a collection of nice ones by merely asking a friend of yours to join the Christian Herald family. Our offer is as follows:

To any Christian Herald reader who sends us $1.00, we will mail the Christian Herald to any address in the United States or Canada, for eight months from the date of receiving the subscription; and for your service in securing the new subscription we will send to you post-paid, or to any address you may designate, these four Ferns, just like those described below. By this plan the Ferns cost you only the effort required to secure the subscription.

Read this Description of the Ferns:

Whitmani Fern. It has very distinct characteristics of its own, in size, shape and growth. It is a healthy, vigorous grower, constantly unfolding fresh fronds.

Boston Fern. This is one of the best known ferns in cultivation and said to be the standard American decorative plant. It is known by some as the Fountain Fern, which name it derived from its graceful drooping habit of growth.

Asparagus Sprengerii. There is always a place in every home for this fern and it is one which will make the most rapid and vigorous growth with the least care or attention. The fronds are very slender, of a deep green shade.

Hardy Russian Violet. Of all delicate perfumes that of the violet is the most delicate and delicious and places this modest little flower among the popular favorites. This variety is a strong grower.

Those of our readers who wish to secure the Ferns in advance may do so by remitting $1 now, together with their promise to secure one new Eight Months' Subscription before a specified date. Collect the $1 from the new subscriber at that time, and thus the advance payment will have been refunded to you, and your Four Beautiful Ferns will have cost you not a single penny. How Is Your Own Church?

Still More Replies from Many Sections Telling of Home Church Conditions

THERE is no evidence of any decline in public interest in the question which THE CHRISTIAN HERALD some time ago asked of its readers, inviting them to write frankly of the spiritual condition of their home churches. We give to-day another instalment of letters on the subject, many of them being necessarily abbreviated:

A Difficult Parish's Progress

I am a pastor of two country appointments which have not as yet organized churches. One service is held in a schoolhouse, the other in a town-house. The places are more than six miles from a village and six and one-half miles apart, in the neighborhood are people who are members of all denominations, with members in some village church. We find it comparatively easy to carry on services, unless weather conditions are bad, and deem our religious work a success in the community. Sunday Schools are attended fairly well; the preaching is evangelistic and is also well attended. While the Sunday Schools have been in progress many years, the preaching services have only existed between three and four years. We are working towards the foundation of a "Union" church in one of the appointments—one not connected with a denomination and where one denomination may worship with as much liberty of conscience as another. Advice from pastors of undenominational churches in rural districts would be much appreciated.

Herschel, Ill. W. J. DAVIS.

The Church vs. the Lodge

The reason why there is so little power in the church is because it has turned its power over to the lodges. They are doing the work the church was called to do, and when even the ministers belong to them, what can one expect? Why is it that most men will attend the lodge in preference to the church? Christ taught brotherly love and all that is good and noble; why does the church not do its duty and look after the widows as the lodges do?

The church and the lodge
Can't go hand in hand;
The one must fall
While the other shall stand.

Lennore, Calif. MRS. A. T.

Neglect of Pastoral Duties

My husband and I were in the town ten years. The pastor, his wife and two members called during that time. In the next five years another member came with the pastor's wife. Later the pastor's wife came and said a member was at the gate, but could not come in.

I saw the members of the church pass my house for years and never come in to see me. One came one day to the door on church business. It will soon be twenty years since I came to this town. MEMBER.

Greenville, Tenn.

This Church Is Growing

My church is the Hebron Baptist. Our young pastor is an exemplary minister. Scores are coming into our church. Prayer meetings, Christian Endeavor Society, Brotherhood meetings, Sunday School and preaching services give us six or more spiritual feasts every week. There are four other Baptist churches within one-half mile of us.

Philadelphia, Pa. MISSION WORKER.

A Reawakened Church

I came to this charge last April and found the two churches in a backward condition spiritually. A considerable part of the money was raised by fairs, festivals, etc. I have labored to bring the people to the Scriptural standard of giving. Also we began praying for a revival. We have had a series of meetings resulting in fifty persons making profession of faith. We preach a whole Gospel, and the temperance cause is earnestly advocated.

Malden, N. Y. G. W. T.

A Church's Spiritual Decline

Ours is a Missionary Baptist Church, small in numbers, weak financially and not strong spiritually. The prayer meeting has almost died out; we have no Sunday School, and have not had one for some time, but few of the members seem to be interested in either Sunday School or prayer meeting. Many of the churches in our part of the world seem to be "at ease in Zion." Is there no remedy?

Moriah, N. C. MEMBER.

A Pleasure-Seeking Community

Albany, Ore., has ten churches and 6,000 inhabitants, three of them have twenty-five persons on an average in attendance, and the others have, say, 100 at each service. Each is little more than a club. The lodge and moving picture shows, skating rink and theatre are the plague of Albany. The spirit of the people here is pleasure-seeking in spite of the hard working ministers here. MEMBER.

Causes of a Church's Decay

In the church of which I have been a member for over forty years, spiritual conditions are low, as in many other country churches. We are losing ground because of lack of faith in God, and in the power of the Holy Spirit; neglect of prayer, secret and family, increasing conformity to the world, and unwillingness to deny self. C. RIPPLE WOVEN

RIPPLETTE

The wash fabric that needs no ironing

You simply wash it—

hang it out to dry and—it's ready to wear

Wear RIPPLETTE and you can live up to your own standards of taste and style, and at the same time practice economy.

This dainty fabric is pre-shrunk and ripplewoven, thus insuring a permanent crinkle that makes ironing unnecessary. This will allow you to provide yourself and your children with an abundance of wash dresses for Spring and Summer wear, without any worry over laundry bills. They only have to go through the washtub and on to the clothes-line; when dry they are just as spic and span and fresh as the day they were made.

Ask them to show you RIPPLETTE at your store.

Note the crepe finish, the beautiful effects in contrasting stripes of fast color, the corded and hemstitch effects in great variety in pure white; and note above all, the clinging texture of RIPPLETTE, so desirable for this season's styles.

And RIPPLETTE is DURABLE. The ripple is woven into the fabric, and the weave is so firm that it cannot stretch or crawl out of shape. Put it to the severest test—make it up into waists or children's dresses—you will find there is no end to the wear. RIPPLETTE is

28 inches wide
15 cents a yard

Its economy suggests many uses—street dresses, shirt waists, kimonos, housedresses, petticoats, children's every day dresses and Sunday school frocks (in white), rompers, nightgowns, etc., etc.

If you cannot get RIPPLETTE at your dealer's, use the coupon below and we will send you a book of samples. Your dealer will then be glad to order for you whatever you may select.

A WIDOW'S LUCK

Quit the Thing That Was Slowly Injuring Her.

A woman tells how coffee kept her from insuring her life:

"I suffered for many years chiefly from trouble with my heart, with severe nervous headaches and neuralgia; but although incapacitated at times for my housework. I did not realize the gravity of my condition till I was rejected for life insurance, because, the examining physician said, my heart was so bad he could not pass me.

"This distressed me very much, as I was a widow and had a child dependent upon me. It was to protect her future that I wanted to insure my life.

"Fortunately for me, I happened to read an advertisement containing a testimonial from a man who had been affected in the same way that I was with heart trouble, and who was benefited by leaving off coffee and using Postum. I grasped at the hope this held out, and made the change at once.

"My health began to improve immediately. The headaches and neuralgia disappeared, I gained in flesh, and my appetite come back to me. Greatest of all my heart was strengthened from the beginning, and soon all the distressing symptoms passed away. No more waking up in the night with my heart trying to fly out of my mouth!

"Then I again made application for life insurance, and had no trouble in passing the medical examination.

"It was seven years ago that I began to use Postum and I am using it still, and shall continue to do so, as I find it a guarantee of good health." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

How Is Your Own Church?

Lack of Reverence and Worldliness

What do you think of a church that will have a Ladies' Aid Society supper on Wednesday evening to make money, on Thursday evening a preparatory service for Communion, and on Friday evening a Brotherhod banquet? Next Sabbath it has Communion—all in the same week. I would have no objection to the suppers or banquets if they were held at some other place. I have the greatest reverence for the house of God. We as church people are losing our reverence for the house of God.

Canton, O. A. G.

Secret Societies Hurt the Church

I am living in a little town away down in Maine of about 200 inhabitants. The church was organized about fifty years since, with some twenty members, which time increased to fifty; but for various reasons the church has diminished and at the present time there are about twenty-five resident and seventeen non-resident members. We have had no settled pastor for many years. We now have preaching from three to six months each season by students. Many members are absent during the winter, and no service is held until spring. The secret societies seem to take away the interest from the church. MEMBER.

A Revival Needed

Our revivals here are a failure as a whole. We need to-day a twentieth century revival all along the line. I believe what the whole world is longing for to-day is for a practical religion to live by each day, showing us a kind heavenly Father who is willing to stand by us to help us to make the most of the talent he has given us. I saw a picture of an evangelist taken with one hand in pocket, while the other was clinched, saying, "You old sinner you!" Is that the right spirit? May the Son of the living God break into our churches. READER.

Does the Church Neglect Woman?

Too much creed and not enough Christ. Years of precious time have been spent on church government, and arguing on predestination, baptism, etc., while all about us is a struggling humanity in need of the Gospel. There is a desire on the part of too many to increase the membership without regard for quality. There was a time when if a member failed to obey the laws of the church, he or she was asked to have the name removed from the record. All are ready to admit that much of the church work is done by its women. Many churches would go out of business if it were not for them. But it makes no difference how much a woman gives, or what she does, woman as a general thing is not recognized on church boards, neither is her name found chiseled in the tablet of marble. M. C. L.

The Old Religion

I am a member of the Methodist church in this place. Our church is gaining in membership, the Gospel is faithfully preached and our church is making spiritual progress. We have for our pastor a man of God. You stated that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has stood for the old religion; this is what our pastor stands for. He preaches it and is living as he preaches. I am glad to be a subscriber for a paper that stands for this old religion. L. H. D.

Do We Neglect the Jews?

All we ever got came from the Jew. I believe God will hold us responsible if we don't do more for them. We have a good Sabbath School here in the country. I never had a better class of young people. We have church once in two weeks, although there are a great many churches without a pastor. A. C. J.

His Work Lives After Him

The memorial volume, The Life-Work of Louis Klopsch, was here on my return for a few days' visit with my family. In expressing to you my heart-felt thanks for the beautiful book, I wish at the same time to tell you how highly I value it because of its record of achievement of one of God's truest noblemen, whom it was my privilege to come to know fairly well. The work he helped to make possible in Japan will tell for eternity. God called him his workman, but his work is living in the Sendai Christian Orphanage. In a very real sense he has helped to evangelize Japan. It was a privilege to have been associated with him. I shall count the volume among my treasures. With best wishes for the continued success of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, WILLIAM E. LAMPE.

ved because of the strange medicine
d the beautiful flower which Rolfe arwick had sent. All the passionate ve and hate of their nature had rned to grateful love. With all her art the old woman longed to repay e young man who had been so kind her.

The men filed into the room, past the t where the smiling child lay. Their ces grew blacker when they saw iuseppe alive and well, for they ought of their own little ones lying leep beneath the newly made mounds.

half dozen talking at once, they irst out into a torrent of angry deands upon Guglielmo to tell them hat to do. Guglielmo's words of ex-anation were scarcely heard amid e uproar, but when they finally un-rstood that he was trying to dissuade em from carrying out their mad purse, they surrounded him, a mass of furiated flying tongues and tossing ms.

Old Mag, who had gathered the child d the rose into her arms, saw that e crisis had come. She sprang into eir midst, eyes flashing. "Wait a inute! Listen!" she cried, "let the ild speak. Giuseppe in the gates of ath was three days ago. To-day is well. Let him speak."

The infuriated men saw the pale ce of the child and became very quiet.
here was not a sound when the thin tle voice piped out. "He is my iend, Mr. Warwick. He gave grand-other stuff to cure me and this rose.
e say when I get well he will give me
e best soda in his store. All medine men, all rich men ain't bad. Mr.
olfe ain't. He is my friend."

The men were listening now. Giu-ppe's part of the story had interested em. The child in her arms, Old Mag gan to tell the story. As eloquently, passionately, as the man of old eaded for Sodom and Gomorrah, so d the grandmother plead in her nave tongue for the lives and the prop-ty of the class she had despised.

In the meantime, rumors of trouble d reached the citizens. Strikes were reatened. All evening crowds gathed on the public square. Angry ices declaimed loudly; from the difrent lodge rooms processions straged to their agreed-upon meeting ace. To the clashing of brass bands, ey marched and waved their blood-
d banners, bearing the inscription, Liberty or die." They wanted work better pay. They wanted money to uy medicine for their suffering chilren. They wanted better living, and ; the different speakers shouted out eir sentiments in no uncertain tones, e flame of anger burned furiously
d high.

Rumors of terrible danger swept over the city that sweet May night. Stories of dynamite fuses planted beneath the monument, the smelter, the factory, were reported, but May Day dawned as bright and as peacefully as it had ever done.

Early that morning Rolfe Warwick saw a party of men forming on the square. As the clock struck ten they fell in line and marched slowly across the street. With fascinated eyes he saw them coming nearer. They stopped in front of the Warwick Pharmacy. With a curious trembling of the heart Rolfe looked for the leader, and wondered what he had done to offend. But the leader was Guglielmo, carrying on his shoulders a pale little lad dressed all in white. He shouted and pointed to Rolfe with a fat little forefinger: "There's my frien' at the sody fountain," he giggled; "forward, march!"

With pattering feet they crossed the threshold. Guglielmo approached the young man. His face was wreathed with smiles. "We brought the little fellow down. He's well and wants to thank you. He says he wants his sody too. While you're about it you might as well fix up one apiece so that we can drink to the success o' you." Rolfe and the tall father clasped hands earnestly. And when the ices were ready, with the little lad in his arms, he stood behind the soda fountain and listened smilingly to the clink of glasses as the members of the Italian Guard drank to the health of Giuseppe's friend.

It was a month after when Mrs. Warwick learned of the story enacted behind the scenes.

The Seventeen-Year Locust

By D. EVERETT LYON, Ph. D.

DURING the present summer, the seventeen-year locust, or more properly speaking, the periodical cicada, is due to appear in many of the Atlantic Coast States, reaching from Connecticut to North Carolina. These insects are scattered over many parts of the United States in separate broods, which have been carefully charted, and some of these broods cover wide areas, like the brood No. 11 which is due to appear this season.

The Cicada with Outspread Wings

Some of these broods appear one year and some another, which has given rise to the notion that they do not remain underground seventeen years before emerging; but careful records kept (some of which reach back to 1775) prove that each individual brood casts its swarm but once in seventeen years, and that with clock-like regularity.

In the extreme South there is a different species that emerge every thirteen years. Why they should do so every thirteen years instead of seventeen has not been satisfactorily explained. They constitute a separate variety, with different habits; for in some sections of the South the seventeen-year and thirteen-year broods overlap, and yet each comes out according to its appointed time.

Many people have needless fears concerning these insects, but they are really harmless. The damage they do to foliage is slight, as the undeveloped digestive organs of the males show that they seldom if ever partake of food in their adult state. We hear of people being stung by them, yet there is not a valid case of this kind on record. I have handled them freely without their showing the slightest sign of anger or resentment. The song of the males is musical, though monotonous. About the last week in May they swarm forth toward sunset and begin their transformation from the pupa to the adult cicada. It is a remarkable natural phenomenon that these pupæ should spend seventeen years under ground for a brief life above the soil of only about six weeks. During their underground life, their presence is unsuspected except to those who know their life history. They are rarely found much below a foot beneath the surface of the earth, though they occasionally burrow to a depth of two feet. During this period, they frequently shed their skins for new ones, and with their suckers attached to the tender roots of trees and bushes, they derive what little nourishment they require. No harm comes to the trees to whose roots they attach themselves.

When the time comes for their emergence, out they rush, climbing the nearest trees and bushes, and on a moonlight night look like so much snow scattered over the trees. Soon after the pupæ, which look like so many beetles, reach the trees, their shells burst open on the back and the cicadas come forth. The wings expand, and in twenty-four hours the insect is hard, and has lost its creamy white appearance. Thousands of the empty shells can be found on the ground. In a very few days, the females begin depositing eggs in the bark of the trees and twigs. Gradually the songs of the males cease as they die off, and soon they disappear entirely. When the females have deposited several hundred eggs, they also fall to the ground and die. In a few weeks, the eggs produce larvæ about one-sixteenth of an inch long. The larva runs to the edge of the branch and deliberately drops to the earth, not knowing how far it will fall. When it reaches the ground, it enters it, to repeat the life history of its parents. By the last of July, all that will remain of them will be their pupal shells, or the dried bodies of the adult insects, while their offspring later on will be down in the ground waiting their allotted time. Sometimes, just before emergence, the pupæ will build little mud huts, which project above ground four to six inches, in which they remain a short time before they swarm.

Among the Workers

—TWO WEEKS' union meeting in the little town of Nyssa, Ore., resulted in 110 professions, including the local editor, prominent stockmen and high school boys. In two weeks in Malheur's county seat 170 accepted Christ, among them the County Judge, County Clerk, ranchers and business men of all ages and classes. There was only one church in the town of less than thirty members. There will be others now. George W. Taylor was the evangelist.

—THE BAND OF LOVE, which started two years ago in a little song and prayer service in Charleston, S. C., has now a membership of one hundred and sixty. From a mere handful it has now outgrown its little chapel and is arranging for larger quarters. During the past year 52 meetings were held, 828 visits made to the sick and bundles of clothing and shoes given to the poor. Papers and tracts have also been distributed over the city. The band feels that its efforts to help others have been crowned with blessings —SEVENTY-SIX NEW MEMBERS, seventy of them on confession of faith, were recently admitted at the communion service in Central Presbyterian Church, Newark, N. J. The church was crowded to its capacity. Among the new communicants were represented three generations of one family. Once before since January 1 a similar event has occurred in the church. At the communion service in February forty-eight new members were received. Thus during the first eighty-five days of the ministry of the new pastor, Rev. Dr. George Walton King, the church roll has been increased by 124, of which number ninety-eight were admitted by confession of faith.

—GROUND WAS RECENTLY broken at Montclair, N. J., for a $32,000 addition to the Christian Union Congregational Church, of which Rev. Henry E. Jackson is pastor. Three hundred boys and girls each took to the church a little spade, and after the service they set to work to break ground for the new addition. At a signal from the pastor each boy and girl dug a spade into the earth and turned up some of the soil. Mr. Jackson made a short address, pointing out the significance of the participation of the children in the work, and appropriate hymns were sung. The addition to the church, which is at Park Street and Cooper Avenue, will be used largely for Sunday School purposes.

—ON SUNDAY, APRIL 16, a celebration was held in the Sixteenth Street Baptist Church, New York City, in honor of Mrs. Miles E. Jenkins, who has been a teacher in the Sunday School for the last fifty years. Mrs. Jenkins is seventy-seven years old, and was born in Dutchess County, New York. When she removed to New York City as a young girl, she took up her residence at Fourteenth Street and Eighth Avenue, which was then one of the best residential sections of the city. She moved from this old home only a few years ago. In reply to the remarks of the pastor, Rev. George H. Dowkontt, in presenting a gift from the Sunday School, Mrs. Jenkins said in part: "Still, I think times are better and there is not the same amount of drinking that there was in my young days. Five of the girls of my class were baptized this morning, and others would have liked to be, but their parents did not consent." In all her fifty years of service Mrs. Jenkins has missed the Sunday School only when absolutely obliged by sickness or deaths in her family.

Making Pledges*

THE story has often been told of Abraham Lincoln and his temperance pledge. He signed it when he was a small boy and always kept it. Almost better than that fact was his willingness to proclaim it. Many have been ashamed to admit that they had signed a temperance pledge. Not so our great President. And to the friend who persuaded him to do this he said, "I owe to you more than to almost any one else of whom I can think."

When a man enters the army, he makes a pledge of loyalty to his country. When a witness is called to testify in court, he has to pledge himself to tell the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth. When a man and woman marry, they take a pledge of faithfulness to each other. When a man accepts a responsible position in a bank or any other great financial or commercial institution, he has to "furnish bonds," which will be forfeited if he is unfaithful to his duty—only another way of saying that he pledges himself to be upright.

Thus the lives of all of us are full of pledges. According to the way in which we keep or break these pledges, does our character stand among those who know us. And yet one often hears a man or woman say, "I make it a point not to bind myself with a pledge of any kind."

It is a silly speech; for whether he realizes it or not, every man who is respected in the community has passed his word, spoken or unspoken, in a thousand directions, to live up to as many obligations. He might just as well, and often better, speak his vow outright. It is the manlier way, and it would have far more influence over others, especially the young.

The figure of the soldier, taking his oath of allegiance to his government, is perhaps the most effective similitude to use in describing the sacred duty of the pledge. He knows that adherence to his word may mean for him the facing of danger and even of death; yet openly he takes his country's vows upon him, and the world knows if he betrays his trust through laziness or cowardice. The motive of regard for the opinion of outsiders, though not a high one, is by no means entirely to be disregarded. It is surely a powerful one in many cases; and, since the soul usually needs all the supports and incentives that it can get, the open pledge is often more effective than the secret one.

More to-day is being said and written upon the will than ever before. Many of the newer sects have demonstrated, with a power hitherto unmatched that the human will, when striving honestly to unite its force with the divine, is almost irresistible If a true man only says to himself, "I will do it." and prays steadfastly for help, he can generally keep his pledge.

Then let us oftener say, "I will accomplish this or that good purpose. I will conquer the difficulties that beset the way." And let us not fear to do this publicly. The addition of the goad of open disgrace to the better and higher motives may be just the mite needed to "help the camel to bear its load."

In Robert E. Speer's Memorial of a True Life, he gives the noble pledge of his friend Beaver of entire loyalty to God: "This 16th day of November, 1895, I, Hugh McA. Beaver, do, of my own free will, give myself and all that I am and have, entirely to him whom having not seen I love, and on whom I believe. Bought with a price, I give myself to him to be used as he shall see fit. Sealed by the Holy Spirit, filled with the peace that passeth understanding, to him be all glory, world without end. Amen."

May all who read these lines make a similar pledge, and may God help them to keep it!

The Howard Watch

Everyone concedes that the Railroad man must have an accurate watch.

His business requires it.

But how about the man in any other calling?

Why should he be content with less than the best in a timepiece?

Is not a cheap or unreliable watch an evidence of slackness in character and habit—a confession as to the slight value he places on his own time.

There is a big change taking place in this country on the watch question.

Respect for a fine watch mechanism increases with culture and civilization.

There are not so many men who think it smart to carry a poor watch and bang it around.

More men every day are willing to put money in a fine watch even if it is carried in the pocket where it cannot always be seen.

A HOWARD Watch is always worth what you pay for it. The price of each watch—from the 17-jewel (double roller) in a Boss or Crescent gold-filled case at $40 to the 23-jewel in a 14-k solid gold case at $150—is fixed at the factory and a printed ticket attached.

Not every jeweler can sell you a HOWARD Watch. Find the HOWARD jeweler in your town and talk to him. He is a good man to know.

Drop us a postal card, Dept. W, and we will send you "The Story of Edward Howard and the First American Watch"—an inspiring chapter of history that every man and boy should read.

Evidence of Divine Blessing*

AS anniversaries come around, whether of individuals or of societies, there are pauses for thought. Once in a while, says old George Herbert, we must "tumble up and down our chests, and see what is in them," and anniversaries furnish such occasions.

Thus, as we celebrate the twenty-second birthday of our League, let us review its history and progress—not only those of the society as a whole, but of our particular branch of it. The Epworth League was founded on great ideals and for noble objects. Have we lived up to them?

Remember that under the stress of great thoughts and motives, such as brought into existence our grand organization, the richest balsams of life, to use one of Browning's great figures, have usually been expressed. It was under such convictions that the wretched, drunken tinker, John Bunyan, reformed his life; was persecuted and thrown into jail for his heroic loyalty to his religion; and ended by enriching our language and our faith by a great spiritual allegory.

In the same way, as Dr. Louis A. Banks relates, a certain young man reached his majority, with little education and with no higher ambition than to drive a hack. Suddenly he was touched by a conviction of sin, and he was led to lay hold upon Christ. A divine desire took possession of him to bring souls into the kingdom. He studied passionately in every department of knowledge that he might better accomplish his object. He became a great scholar and teacher, and thousands of the unconverted were brought through him to serve his Master.

That is what our society ought to do for us—to constantly stir us to noble, unselfish action, as we attend its meetings and ponder upon its objects. It ought to make us more ardent for self-improvement in order that we may spread Christ's work more efficiently and win souls for him. Has it done this for us?

An interesting feature of the foreign missionary work is the comparative ease with which fluent preachers can be developed among the natives of almost every country. What Dr. Speicher says of China is true in general—that the great need of the young Chinese churches is not only for leaders with so-called "gifts," but for those possessing also the power and will to be "living examples of the Gospel they preach." Is not the same thing true of our League? And have we not perhaps unduly exalted the more showy gifts of eloquence and readiness of speech over the solid, fundamental virtues of Christian character?—"love, joy, peace, longsuffering, kindness, goodness, faithfulness, meekness, temperance"?

These saintly qualities come not with the simple desire, but only by long prayer and battles of the spirit. To gain them for each of its members should be the object of every meeting of our League. One of our modern poets has voiced well the despondency of the soul which, like so many of us, has stumbled and given way to temptation. A man cries to "his angel" that the battle is going against him. What shall he do?

> Then said to the man his Angel,
> "Thou wavering, witless soul,
> Back to the ranks! What matter
> To win or to lose the whole?
> "While kings of eternal evil
> Yet darken the hills about,
> Thy part is with broken sabre
> To rise on the last redoubt.
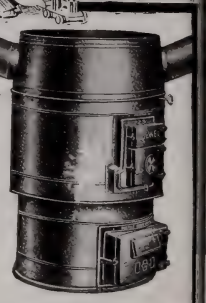
> "To fear not sensible failure,
> Nor covet the game at all,
> But fighting, fighting, fighting,
> Die, driven against the wall."



And that, though the world may account it failure, God will account victory. The watchword of our League for this year may well be, "Fight to the end. Never give up."

king" (I. Pet. 2: 17). He said in part:

"This is a practical and utilitarian age, an age which concerns itself not chiefly with another world, but with the more engrossing and pressing affairs of this; not so much with temples as with temporalities. And yet it also is, in its appreciations and in its insistencies, an age of moralities, as practically shown in two appealing and comprehensive forms of ethical expression.

"And so, for the sake of our common humanity, to bless and to crown it; and for the sake of our common country, to help us more and more to love and to serve it and to make it take its place, its true and destined place, for righteousness and peace, among the nations of the earth, we consecrate today, as the offering of our love, these memorial chapels and this cathedral choir, to the service here among us of the Incarnate Jesus Christ; God of God, Light of light, very God of very God, by whom all things were made, who for us men and for our salvation, in this world as another, came down from heaven and was made man. And we have seen his glory, shining on and in and through our human life to-day, giving righteousness to it, philanthropic and patriotic. And this cathedral shall help us as long as it shall stand more and more to see it; the glory as of the only begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth!"

The music, led by the splendid organ, was wonderfully rendered. Seldom does one have the opportunity of hearing such execution. The flutelike voices of the boy sopranos rang through the arches with wonderful effect.

The Episcopal Cathedral of St. John the Divine is the largest ecclesiastical structure in America and the fourth largest in Christendom. Although only partially constructed, it has already been twenty years in building, and it may take as much longer to complete it. Seating accommodations are now provided for 1,700 persons. The full capacity will approach 7,000. The choir is now roofed and partly cased, and the eight giant columns, each sixty-five feet high, which cluster about the altar, are in place, with the names carved upon them of those whom their donors wish to commemorate. Two of the seven chapels in the apse of the chancel have been completed, and with them their stained glass windows. These are to be called the Chapels of the Tongues, and the intention is that in each religious services will be conducted in one of seven foreign languages—French, German, Spanish, Italian, Swedish, Chinese and Armenian.

This magnificent building was proposed and first planned for in the days of Bishop Horatio Potter, but nothing was really accomplished till after he had, when on his death-bed, consigned the work that was so near his heart to his nephew, Bishop Henry C. Potter. During his tenure of office the first actual construction was started, and it is in a large measure due to his efforts that the building is as near completion as it is at present.

A GREAT OPPORTUNITY

I STRONGLY indorse the principles of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, especially its adherence to orthodox Christianity and the distribution of charity to the suffering of earth, even to its remotest bounds. I think there never was a greater opportunity in China than now. To go with the Bible in one hand and a loaf of bread in the other will make an impression on the official life of China that they will remember, and that will guarantee a still better protection to our missionaries in that benighted country. With best wishes for the success of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, I am, etc.,

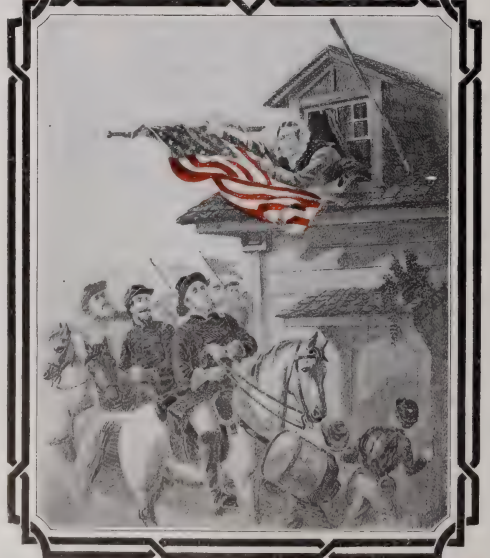
You have the Bible, of course, but have you the Declaration of Independence and the American Flag? Wouldn't you like to own a large American Flag, like the one shown in the picture, if you could get it practically for nothing?

Not a little hand flag, understand, but a large-size "Old Glory," 6 feet long by 4 feet wide, bigger than the top of your dining-room table. It is real red, white and blue, right from the factory of the government flag-maker.

Declaration of Independence

Every patriotic member of the Christian Herald Family has it in his or her power to secure, without money, a large American Flag like the one shown in the illustration, and a life-size fac-simile of the Declaration of Independence, 26x31 inches, an exact duplicate in every way of the priceless document which hangs framed on the walls of the old State House in Philadelphia.



Here is an opportunity to keep faith with your patriotism, for you will not only have use for a Flag on every holiday for years to come, but you can also use it constantly for decorative purposes in public and private sociables, in the schoolhouse, in the church, and, best of all, in the home.

Flag is 4x6 Feet in Size

Just think of being able to celebrate Memorial Day, Flag Day, the Fourth of July, with a Flag as big as this! Wouldn't it be better than fire-crackers for the children?

Every new Christian Herald reader means the assistance of another soul who will work in common with this great congregation in its laudable purpose of spreading the teachings of the Gospel to every nook and corner of the world.

"She leaned far out on the window-sill,
And shook it forth with a royal will.
'Shoot, if you must, this old gray head,
But spare your country's flag,' she said."
—John Greenleaf Whittier.

GET ONE FOR THE PATRIOTIC HOLIDAYS!

WHEN SORROW CAME

WHEN Sorrow came, I did not look
For any visitor that day,
But in beside the ingle-nook
She slipped in calm, familiar way,
As one, a dear and privileged guest,
Who pushes wide a door ajar,
And, seeking only friendly rest,
Sits down where all the kindred are.

And first, surprised, I scarcely knew
A word to greet the stranger face;
There crept a numbing shadow through
The brightness of my dwelling place.
So dumb her lips, so veiled her eyes,
So chill the hand in mine she laid,
The sunshine vanished from the skies,
And in the cloud I knelt, afraid.

But Sorrow stayed, until I heard,
In that hushed silence round her drawn,
Voices more sweet than song of bird,
The tender notes of loved ones gone.
And floating from the silvern shore,
Whereon the ransomed walk serene,
Came wafts of fragrance blown before
The angels as they hither lean.

Then, swift transfigured, Sorrow turned.
Her look was wonderful to see;
My very soul within me burned,
For Love in sorrow died for me.
And Love appoints my sorrow still,
And sacramental cups are poured
Where I and Sorrow, if God will,
Meet and hold tryst with my dear Lord.

An Indian Evangelist

TO HENRY L. CLOUD, the "Indian Evangelist" of the Oklahoma Methodist Conference, belongs the honor of having been the only representative of his race to secure election to the Constitutional Convention which in 1907 brought into the Union the new-born State of Oklahoma. Mr. Cloud was nominated by the Republican Party, ran as an out-and-out Prohibitionist, and led his party ticket by a good plurality.

Henry L. Cloud

Mr. Cloud is a three-quarter blood Cherokee Indian. His parents were Christians, and when he was left an orphan at about eleven years of age, an uncle arranged for his entry to the Cherokee Orphan School near Pryor Creek. During his course there he became a member of the Methodist Church. When he was sufficiently advanced he became a teacher, and as he was entirely dependent on his efforts, he made this the means of securing higher educational privileges.

Before taking up his present work, Mr. Cloud successfully filled several pastorates. Those who know his work best, speak of him as an evangelist of the Gipsy Smith type. Great interest and fine spiritual results have attended his efforts in the Southwestern States where he labors. He has always been an ardent worker for prohibition, and was sent by the Oklahoma Woman's Christian Temperance Union to Washington, D. C., to work for the prohibition clause in the act that granted Statehood to the combined territory of Oklahoma and Indian Territory.

Mr. Cloud has delivered over and over again a lecture, entitled, "An Indian on the Warpath." For this lecture he dresses in the garb of his forefathers. REV. WALLACE I. TORBET.

A Splendid Gift

THROUGH a gift of Mrs. A. D. Juilliard, the West Side Young Men's Christian Association, 318 West Fifty-seventh Street, New York, has purchased the building of the First Church of the Disciples of Christ, adjoining the Young Men's Christian Association on the Fifty-sixth Street side. Men have been turned away from the present West Side dormitories at the rate of about fifty a week, as it was impossible to provide for them. Because of this condition, work of tearing down the church was commenced at once and the erection of the dormitory will be pushed as rapidly as possible. It is believed the building will be ready for occupancy by September, 1911.

There will be over two hundred dormitory rooms in the new building, which with the fifty-five rooms in the present dormitory will afford accommodations for almost four hundred men. The building will be modern throughout and will cost about $200,000. The first floor will be occupied by the Boy's Department and the upper floors as dormitories. The West Side Young Men's Christian Association now has a membership of 5,400—the largest in the world.

A Luxury-Loving Dog

MY greyhound discovered that my neighbor had been making ice cream, and being fond of good things, he went on a tour of investigation. He found the freezer on the porch where it had been placed to harden. Soon his eyes and all of his head disappeared. He was without doubt inspecting it. My good neighbor spied him, and her shouts "made the welkin ring"; but poor Joe could not part company with the freezer. He ran with the incumbrance on his head, whither he knew not. Finally he ran against a fence, then a tree, then the side of the house. He tried to explode the nuisance, but of no avail was bark or howl. After a time—soon enough to save poor Joe but not the cream—he was rescued. The lady took the freezer and I my dog, and they parted company. Joe was cured of his love of that luxury. Ever after he would run and howl at sight of a freezer. M. M. H.

Printype Wins!

A New Creation in Typewriter Type, Whose Beauty, Readability and Attention-Value Have Captivated the Public—"TYPEWRITES PRINT!"

Another great Oliver innovation—PRINTYPE.

Some months ago, without announcement, we placed The Printype Oliver Typewriter on the market.

Its only advertising, two pamphlets and a mailing card.

To-day, one-third of our output of Oliver Typewriters are Printypes.

It's more than a success. It's a revolution in typewriter type!

Printype is the most beautiful, readable, attractive, attention-compelling type ever evolved for typewriters.

We want to write you a letter on The Printype Oliver Typewriter so that you can compare Printype with the old-style outline Pica typewriter type. This object lesson will show at a glance the overwhelming advantages of Printype.

It will explain why the new type face, without a line of advertising, scored an instantaneous triumph.

When you receive our letter, mark the marvelous clearness, the surpassing beauty of Printype. See how it meets the eye! "As plain as print"—it is print! Contrast the perfectly shaded letters and numerals of Printype with the thin outline type. The difference is easily 100 per cent in favor of Printype.

Printype is virtually book-type—the type which the eye has been trained to grasp quickly.

The type which is always used by publishers—whether it be for a newspaper, a magazine or a rare book in edition de luxe.

The type which the crystallized experience of centuries proves best for the printed page. Yet it costs you no more than the old style.

It is not a mere coincidence that to the same typewriter company which introduced visible writing now falls the honor of presenting Printype. There's a deeper significance. Think it over.

The Singular Beauty of Printype

Printype is the very soul of symmetry. The shadings give body, refinement, distinction and life which are utterly lacking in the old-style thin outline letters and numerals. The completeness and perfection of Printype makes it a delight to the eye.

The Attention-Value of Printype

A letter written in Printype attracts the eye—it's magnetic. A Printype letter is so strikingly attractive, so forceful, so distinctive that one unconsciously picks it out from a mass of mail, to read first.

Its perfection compels attention. It gets "preferred position" always.

A large part of our sales have resulted from letters like this, sent by interested correspondents to users of the new machine:

"For goodness sake, what machine did you use to write that letter?"

The answer—a Printype Oliver—makes the sale.

Printype Aids Eyesight

Printype aids and rests the eyes. None of the strain on the optic nerve that sharp, thin, outline type imposes. You read a Printype letter as swiftly and easily as the page of a primer.

This elimination of effort makes it a positive pleasure to read Printype correspondence. To the business man who signs hundreds of letters a day, Printype offers welcome relief. Ask the opinion of your oculist or optician. He knows the value of Printype!

Printype Prevents Errors

Printype makes every letter, every numeral, every character employed in the whole wide range of commercial transactions perfectly plain!

Each separate word stands out instead of blurring and running together.

Printype figures don't lie. No possible chance of confusing 3 with 8 or 5 with 3. No errors, confusion and misunderstanding because of too great similarity.

Printype — OLIVER Typewriter

The Standard Visible Writer

Wherever accuracy is demanded, Printype is worth a premium. Yet it costs not a penny more when you purchase a Printype Oliver Typewriter.

A Printype Test by Linotype Operators

One of the hundreds of interesting and conclusive tests preliminary to announcing Printype was made under our direction by various newspaper publishers. Linotype operators of equal dexterity were pitted against each other in a speed contest. One set of operators were supplied with copy written with the regular typewriter face.

The opposing operators were supplied with copy written in Printype.

It was found that the linotype operator could increase his output 10 per cent, setting from "Printype" copy, over copy written with the ordinary "outline" typewriter type. Think of the enormous saving of time when the many thousands of other people who daily read typewriting and use the typewriter, adopt the wonderful new type-face!

17 Cents a Day
for The Printype Oliver Typewriter

Thousands of dollars have been expended in producing this wonderful typewriter type, yet you pay only the regular price of $100 for the complete machine, the new Oliver No. 5, equipped to write in Printype. You can buy The Printype Oliver on the famous 17-Cents-a-Day Purchase Plan. No matter what typewriter you are using, you can turn it in on your first payment for the new Oliver and let pennies complete the purchase.

Send Coupon for Printype Oliver Book and Letter Written in Printype

To realize the difference between Printype and the old-style typewriter type, you must read a letter written in Printype.

On receipt of the coupon, or a postal, we will write you a specimen letter on The Printype Oliver Typewriter and forward a copy of the book, "A REVOLUTION IN TYPEWRITER TYPE." If interested, ask for details of the "17-Cents-a-Day Purchase Plan," which has added so many thousands to the ranks of typewriter users.

We urge upon merchants, manufacturers, publishers, financial institutions, professional men, public accountants and all who are interested in efficiency, the importance of investigating the new face in Typewriterdom—PRINTYPE.

A WEEKLY ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER FOR THE HOME

THE LAST GATHERING OF THE BOWERY MISSION BREAD LINE BEFORE IT CLOSED AT EASTER

THE BREAD LINE'S BUSIEST SEASON

141,000 Meals Served to Homeless and Hungry Men at the Bowery Mission

THE Bowery Mission Bread Line has just completed its longest and by far its most interesting season. Thanksgiving of 1910 came at the earliest and Easter of 1911 at the latest possible date. Altogether there were 141 breakfasts, making a total of 141,000 meals served.

The class of men found in the Bread Line was very much the same as in previous years, except that perhaps there was even a larger percentage of the typical able-bodied unemployed workman. Of course, there have been every morning several of that pathetic class that society, alas, so readily puts on one side as being "too old" to work; and there has always been a proportion of sick men, who ought to have been in some hospital, rather than walking the streets in the chill wintry weather, without a roof to cover them.

The large number of able and willing men, however, that the Bread Line has helped has been evidenced by the busy state of the Free Labor Bureau during the winter months, by the number of positions that have been secured, and by the splendid record they have made.

Between September 30, 1910, and March 31, 1911, 2,046 such positions were found, most of them being in country places. Since the organization of the Bureau in January, 1907, 10,731 men have been placed.

During the last six months, the Bowery Mission Free Labor Bureau has become known to employers of a higher grade of labor, and in consequence men of a better class have registered. In nearly every case, however, the men have been entirely destitute, and, with very few exceptions, have graduated from the Bread Line. There is abundant evidence of the splendid human material that is submerged in the dire poverty conditions of the Bowery, in the letters we have received from employers to whom men have been sent. For instance, one writes from Salt Point, N. Y., "C. W. arrived at the appointed time and is doing well; he is a good plower. I hope I can keep him." One from Torrey, Pa., "We are well pleased with the man. He is industrious and quick to learn." Another from Mount Upton, N. Y., "He is a much better man than I expected to get." Another from Westford, Conn., "Report safe arrival of the man. Thus far, perfectly satisfactory." Another from Wallkill, N. Y., "Six men came on Wednesday, and three last evening. Will be pleased to have another good man."

Serving the "Line" in the Bowery Mission Kitchen

Equally pleasing have been the many letters we have received from the men themselves. The following are a few types of such letters:

Canajoharie, N. Y.: "I am getting along all right on the farm and making good." Bronx Borough, New York City: "I am still serving the Lord. God is with me in everything I do. I have got a very hard place; but I will keep it till I can get a better." Apollo, Pa.: "I got here all right and am very glad. It is a home fit for any man." Oyster Bay, N. Y.: "One week gone and profitably spent. This is no picnic, yet I thank God for the job. I find great respect for old age. All are kind to me."

Many visitors, amongst them CHRISTIAN HERALD readers from all parts of the United States and Canada, have visited the Bread Line, and without exception they manifested the kindliest sympathy and keenest interest.

They have been cordially received by one of the Bowery Mission converts who, a few years ago, was himself a miserable "wastrel" on the Bowery, but has made a splendid record at the Mission and has since the closing of the Bread Line been appointed assistant superintendent of the Church Rescue Mission of Boston, Mass.

I allude to Charles H. Kendall, who will be remembered with the most grateful feelings by thousands

THE MOTIVE OF THE CROSS

TEXT: Rom. 5:8—"God commendeth his love toward us, in that, while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us."

DID Paul exaggerate when he said, "God forbid that I should glory save in the Cross?" Did he go too far in his Letter to the Corinthians when he said, "I am determined not to know anything among you save Jesus Christ and him crucified"? I believe he told the whole truth, for "The Cross of Christ" is Christianity; "The Cross of Christ" means saving experience. "The Cross of Christ" left out, everything worth while has been left out.

Right in the midst of old Edinburgh stands the Castle Rock. Centuries ago they built a fort on it, and that great Castle Rock has been the key to the possession of Edinburgh. When it was captured by the English, the English owned Edinburgh; and when the Scotch recaptured it, the Scotch owned Edinburgh. Whoever had that Castle Rock in hand commanded the situation for the city. And more than that, this solid rock gives Edinburgh largely its foundation. Among the first things I heard when I got there was that Mr. Kemp's church was founded on Castle Rock, though it is out of sight of it. The ledges run out from it under the houses of the city. What Edinburgh Castle and its Castle Rock are to that city, "The Cross of Jesus Christ" is to Christianity. It is the centre and foundation of everything. When you have given up the Cross, you have surrendered Christianity. Underneath everything in Christianity is the Cross. We read of "the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world," reaching back into eternity past. We read again of "the Lamb as it had been slain, in the midst of the throne," thus reaching forward into eternity future. Its great solid ledges lie under the Church, its creed, its institutions, its membership, its character. Everything in Christianity is founded upon the Cross.

Now, there are just two things in this text: First, a great fact; second, a great act. First, the greatest fact in the universe; second, the greatest act in all history.

The Great Fact

"God commendeth his love toward us, in that, while we were yet sinners." The great fact is that there is a God who loves and commends his love to the unlovely. The fact that there is a God modern science has largely forgotten, and modern society has ignored it. But if I should speak of one thing that God has given to me above all else during the past three months, I should say this: the sense of God. I had it on the ocean in its solitude; I had it amid the mountains with their beauty; I had it in the great crowded city with its millions; I had it in the pulpit surrounded by sympathetic Christian people—a new overwhelming sense of God; that there is a God who thinks, and loves, and plans. And the great fact of this universe is that behind all nature and all history is God, who made nature, and makes and remakes history. But the great fact has its climax in the greater fact of our text. "God commendeth his love toward us in that while we were yet sinners." The word "sinner" means primarily a failure, one who has missed the mark. God, though we were failures, still loved us. But the word "sinner" goes further and means a criminal against God. Crime is an offense against society; sin is a crime against God. Sir Robert Anderson contends that man did not fall morally in his relation to man, but spiritually in his relation to God. A man can, therefore, still be moral in his relations to man, in his relations to his family, and the community and the country, and a great sinner in his relation to God. The moral fall came as the result of the spiritual fall. And when a man gets wrong with God, he will get wrong with everybody else sooner or later; and when a man gets right with God, he will get right with everybody else sooner or later. "God commendeth his love toward us" in that while we are failures and criminals toward him, he still loves us, loves us even as failures, loves us even as criminals.

"Christ died for us." The greatest act in history. He lived for us, yes; he preached for us, yes; he worked for us, yes. But greater than all, he died for us, and without his death his preaching amounts to little; without his death his working amounts to little; without his death his teaching amounts to little. "Christ died for us." His standard of greatness was this, "If any man would be great among you, let him become the servant of all." And the greatest act of history in the light of this definition is the death of Christ. He died for us, and in the deepest sense served all.

Life at Its Best

In Jesus Christ on the cross we have life at its best. Life at its worst simply protects itself, and that may be cowardice. The life that simply shields itself is the life of a coward; but the life that gives itself is life at its best, the life of a hero. The life that simply protects itself is life at its worst, but the life that puts itself on the altar is life at its best. And as you count the monuments in bronze and marble and granite, you will find that with scarcely an exception the people who have built those monuments had that in view. Here was a life that was willing to die; here was a life not at its worst in protection, but at its best in self-sacrifice.

Love at its worst simply enjoys itself; love at its best seeks to make others happy and forgets itself. The divorce courts are kept busy just because men get married in order to be happy, and women get married in order to be happy. If they would get married to make somebody else happy, the divorce courts would have to go out of business. The love that simply forgets itself and seeks to serve others is at its best.

Light at its worst simply displays itself; light at its best sacrifices itself. What is this flower, these beautiful roses? Sacrificed light; light taken up, given off by the sun, forgetful of itself, not trying to preserve itself, but just giving itself into leaf and bud and root and petal until we have the beauty of the garden. And the light that gives itself off for others is the Light of the Cross, Jesus Christ, in infinite love forgetting himself, as he puts himself on the altar for us and becomes the Light which is the Light of the world.

Holiness is at its worst when it simply cultivates itself. And that is the matter with so many holiness meetings. They just meet to cultivate and to foster holiness; and it is real holiness, but holiness at its worst. Holiness at its best does not seek to cultivate itself, but puts itself on the altar for the good of humanity and seeks to save other people. Jesus Christ was holiness wherever he went, but Christ on the cross meant holiness at its noblest, not cultivating itself, but giving itself for the unholy.

Power at its worst simply asserts itself, while power at its best gives itself for the weak. Power at its worst destroys. Power at its best saves. Power at its worst is dangerous; power at its best gives protection.

True Liberty and Peace

Liberty at its worst means doing as you please. It says, "I will not be subservient to anybody, God or man," and that is anarchy, barbarism. But liberty at its best says, "I rejoice in the liberty to give up my liberty, to make others free. I have the liberty to die for my country. I have the liberty to be true to my convictions and go to jail. I have the liberty to sell myself into slavery, as a Christian missionary did, and go and work among the slaves that I may make them free." And Jesus Christ on the cross is liberty at its best, liberty that gives up its liberty that the enslaved sinner may be free, while it gives the highest civilization, kills anarchy, and makes the Home, the Church and the State everything that they ought to be.

Peace at its worst means compromise. It does not contend for principle. It surrenders and gets the experience of Napoleon at Waterloo. Peace at its worst says, "We must get together, no matter whether there is a sacrifice of truth and of principle or not;" but peace at its best says, "First pure, then peaceable." Now this is a day we ought to remember. It is a day appointed by the Peace Commissioners on which all the preachers of the world are invited to give a sermon on arbitration; and God knows every Christian ought to hate war. Jesus Christ is the Prince of Peace, but he gives peace not as the world gives it, at its lowest, by compromise and by surrender, but at its highest, by victory. There is only one thing worse than war, and war with its bloodshed, its groans and the sorrow that follows, is hell. The one thing worse than war is injustice. In Jesus Christ on the cross there is peace at its best, no sacrifice of justice. The love of God furnishes the satisfaction which his justice demands. In Jesus Christ on the cross we have perfect peace, peace with God, peace with conscience, peace with righteousness, peace with holiness, peace with everything that is good, and not peace at the lowest by the sacrifice of justice, righteousness and holiness. Said a man to me, "I am trusting the mercy of God; I have confessed my sin. I don't need any cross; I don't need any blood atonement." Stop, friend, you have peace at the sacrifice of justice, for mercy is injustice. The very moment the judge begins to be merciful, he ceases to be just. But in Jesus Christ on the cross God can be merciful because justice has been met. He can be "just and the justifier of him that believeth on Jesus." The man who depends upon God's mercy apart from Jesus Christ on the cross is demanding that God shall be unjust, that God shall give him peace in opposition to the very nature of His being.

Love Once Told

One thing more. Christ on the cross answers all the problems that perplex us. I met a man on the ocean who declared that he was a wanderer on the face of the earth. A gentleman who had talked with him more intimately said, "That man told me his wife died a year ago. He had seven children. He locked his door and has never gone inside the house again. He has put his children in school. The furniture is in there just as it was when he left it." The man himself said to me, "Nature, sir, is unkind." I replied, "Let nature be unkind, but God is kind. God loves, and God commends his love toward us, in that, while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us."

Have you read that wonderful book, The Silence of God? Oh, the pathos of it! The Armenians butchered by the Turks, pure women crying to God for help, and God silent. The basal proposition of the book, you remember, is: After God has shown his love to us in Jesus Christ dying for us on the cross, he is under no obligation to tell us again that he loves us. We ought to believe it. Believe it when the heart breaks, believe it when the clouds gather, believe it when the storm rages, believe it when the wreck comes. God commendeth his love in Jesus Christ, and as you sit with your broken heart and your wrecked fortune, your life a failure, if you will believe in the Christ that died, you can still know that God loves you. And out of that knowledge comes a power that will reconstruct your life and make it a success. "God commendeth his love toward us, in that, while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us." I wish I could write it in letters of light on the window of your soul, that every time you look out you may see it. "Christ died for us." He was born of a virgin for us, he preached for us, he lived for us, he worked for us, but, best of all, he died for us; and in dying he bore the guilt of sin. He made it possible for God to be merciful and still to be righteous, to give us peace of soul on the basis of love linked with justice. "Glory to God in the highest!"

Giving Thanks

A LITTLE strength was lost each day,
A little hope dropped by the way,
The feet dragged slowly up the road,
The shoulders bent beneath their load,
Courage seemed dying in the heart,
The will played but a feeble part.
Night brought no ease,
Day no surcease
From heavy cares or wearying smart.
Then why give thanks?

Somehow strength lasted through the day,
Hope joined with courage in the way;
The feet still kept the up-hill road,
The shoulders did not drop their load,
An unseen Power sustained the heart
When flesh and will failed in their part,
While God gave light
By day and night,
And also grace to bear the smart.
For this give thanks—

Thanks for the daily bread, which feeds
The body's wants, the spirit's needs;
Thanks for the keen, the quick'ning word,
"He only lives who lives in God,"
Whether his time on earth is spent
In lordly house or labor's tent.
Thanks for the light
By day and night
Which shows the way the Master went.
And he gave thanks.

Revival Work in Wales

THE work of Dr. Chapman and Mr. Alexander in Swansea, Wales, during April was full of interest. An unexpected and interesting incident took place one evening at a great meeting for men. The floor and gallery of Albert Hall were packed with men. They had put force and vigor into the singing. Then Dr. J. A. Rawlings, one of the most influential of Swansea's ministers, arose. Referring to the Peace Treaty suggested by President Taft, which had received the approval of Sir Edward Grey, he said, 'I want to ask Dr. Chapman, who is a citizen of the United States, to convey to President Taft that this great meeting most heartily and earnestly prays that the suggestion of President Taft may speedily bear fruit in a treaty between our government and the United States, a treaty which, I hope and believe, would be the beginning of a truce of God amongst all the nations." The great audience of men rose to their feet and loudly applauded. Then Dr. Chapman, in a few sentences, thanked them and expressed the pleasure it would give him to convey the message. "Now," he said, "let us sing 'God Save the King,'" a request which met with a most enthusiastic response. 'Now we'll sing it as we do in our country," he said, and, standing shoulder to shoulder on the platform, Dr. Chapman, Mr. Alexander, and Mr. Naftzger sang together the American national anthem:

My country, 'tis of thee,
Sweet land of liberty,
Of thee I sing.

Further applause greeted this, but the most thrilling scene took place a moment later, when Dr. Chapman said, 'Now let us all join in singing 'All Hail the Power of Jesus' Name," and as "Crown Him Lord of All" was reached it almost seemed as if the building could not contain the sound.

The Desert Places

By EUGENE THWING

WHAT is there in the desert places of earth to appeal to our interest, to arouse our enthusiasm? Surely there are too many desert places, and some of them are very much in the way in this crowding, bustling, busy world. Man is eager and impatient. Civilization demands that everything shall be put to use; shall contribute to his onward march, his success, his pleasure. The desert places obstruct him; they increase his labor; they thrust themselves across his path, and seem to defy his restless ambition.

What are they like, these desert places? A wilderness of sand or baked clay, utterly parched and bare; a place left desolate by nature, or made desolate by the ruthlessness or neglect of man; a place where no water is, no cool shade, no pleasant growing things, no comfort and no joyful life; a place of solitude, and emptiness, and gloom. We think of the wide Sahara with its drifting sands, or the stony plains of Asia, or the great American desert, pierced only by steel rails for trains which hurry across from East to West.

WELL, what have we to do with the desert places? We can keep away from them; and if we must travel, we can go around some other way. There is enough to occupy our thought in the busy town. We can refresh our jaded energies in the green and fertile country, and enjoy the trees and flowers, the singing of the birds, and the laughing waters that flow through fertile valleys. The desert depresses and repels us. Why not leave it alone?

In the Bible we find other meanings of the desert. It is a place of temptations, solitude, and persecution; a place inhabited by evil spirits, or visited by them; a home of people who are ignorant or neglectful of God; a place of suffering, and human desolation, and sin. The desert is not always a dry and lonely stretch of sand, or stones, or clay. It may be, and very often it is, a crowded city where the hearts are stony; where lives are made desolate by persecution and neglect; where the springs of living water do not flow. The desert places are at our doors, and we have everything to do with them.

UP AND down through Palestine Christ walked and worked in the desert. He went alone into the solitary places to pray; but he came again into the crowded towns and villages to work. He found multitudes of men and women and children whose lives were like the dead things of the desert. Ignorance, disease, pain, and sorrow were everywhere. There was no medical or surgical science worthy the name. Sickness, either of heart or of body, could not be cured. A woman cast herself at his feet after twelve years of misery; she "had suffered many things of many physicians, and had spent all that she had, and was nothing bettered, but rather grew worse." Into the desolation of her life he came with healing; but it cost him something; for he felt at once that virtue had gone out of him.

Astonished and eager, great multitudes came pouring out of their desolate homes and surged around him, "having with them those that were lame, blind, dumb, maimed, and many others, and cast them down at Jesus' feet, and he healed them."

Weary of body, often without time even "so much as to eat," he went up and down through the great crowded human desert of Palestine, spending himself and being spent, with a great passion of love, for the pain-stricken multitudes in "villages, or cities, or country," where "they laid the sick in the streets" before him; and, behold, the "blind receive their sight, and the lame walk, the lepers are cleansed, and the deaf hear; the dead are raised up, and the poor have the Gospel preached to them." Wherever he went, "As many as touched him were made perfectly whole." When, one day, his disciples urged him to send away the crowds, saying, "This is a desert place; send them away, that they may buy themselves bread," he said, "They need not depart; give ye them to eat," and immediately, in the desert, the multitude was fed.

THE desert places of the world to-day are our fields for labor; they are our places of greatest opportunity and privilege. "The works that I do, shall ye do also, and greater works than these shall ye do"—the most inspiring and glorious commission ever given to man! China to-day is a great "desert place," and CHRISTIAN HERALD readers have gone into it gladly to feed more than "five thousand." They have gone into India, and into Russia, and into Finland, into Armenia, and Cuba, and Japan in the name of him who gave them their commission, and they have carried bread in one hand and the Gospel in the other; and they are waiting for every call that comes from any of the sad desert places of earth, ready to respond again and again.

CLOSE at hand are desert places in homes that to outward appearance are as other homes; in hearts that often hide their misery, but that cry in secret, "My spirit is overwhelmed within me; my heart within me is desolate." If we have accepted the great commission; if we have an undying passion for healing and helping, we will search out the desert places near us as well as those afar. We will go into them daily and "strengthen the weak hands, and confirm the feeble knees." We will "say to them that are of a fearful heart, Be strong, fear not." Then, all around us, in our cities and our villages, in our factories and in our homes, in our crowded slums and in our polite but too often benighted neighborhoods, "the eyes of the blind shall be opened, and the ears of the deaf shall be unstopped. The lame man shall leap as an hart, and the tongue of the dumb shall sing."

WHAT is there in the desert places of earth to appeal to our interest, to arouse our enthusiasm? There is everything worth while. As the soil in many parts of the desert is really fertile, needing only a supply of moisture to bring life, and vegetation, and rich productiveness, so in the human desert places there is always the possibility of a glad awakening to new life. We can irrigate them with springs of living water, and "the wilderness and the solitary place shall be made glad. The desert shall rejoice and blossom as the rose. It shall blossom abundantly, and rejoice with joy and singing." What desert place is there nearest your own home waiting for you to transform?

Dragon Trees of Teneriffe

STANDING with an upturned face,
In my fancy now am I;
And what is it meets my gaze,
As I peer into the sky?

Is it hordes of honey-bees?
Is it faun or hippogrif?
No, it is the Dragon Trees—
Dragon Trees of Teneriffe.

At Laguna one hath stood
For a thousand years, 'tis said;
And it may be strong and good
When a thousand more have sped.

Very slow the growth of these,
And no branches do they throw,
Till the blossoms clothe the trees
In the fifteenth year or so.

One at Ortova that grew
Was most ancient known to be;
For six thousand seasons through
It had sentineled the sea.

In its hollow trunk, 'tis said,
Gauchos mystic service held,
By some superstition led,
In the gruesome days of eld.

Half a century ago,
Reft was this one by a storm;
And there's not a trace to show
Aught of its once regal form.

Standing with an upturned face,
In my fancy now am I;
And what is it meets my gaze
As I peer into the sky?

Is it hordes of honey-bees?
Is it faun or hippogrif?
No, it is the Dragon Trees—
Dragon Trees of Teneriffe.

The Anti-Fly Crusade

FOR several years a subject of increasing interest has been presented to the public.

We speak of the fly—the common house fly—which spreads filth and disease, which causes sickness and misery; the great destroyer of peace, health and happiness.

A few years ago flies were looked upon as scavengers. They were thought of as a necessary evil. Now they have been found out.

There is no longer any doubt of the fact that the common house fly—Musca Domestica—or as Dr. L. O. Howard, National Entomologist, calls it, the "Typhoid Fly," is responsible for much, yea, very much of our sickness. It has been proven time and again that the fly carries the bacilli of typhoid, tuberculosis, and other malignant diseases.

The fly is not only a disseminator of disease, but is one of the most troublesome and loathsome enemies of mankind; more to be feared than a mad dog or a snake in the grass or a wild animal roaming at will.

The fly is insidious. He lurks in every corner. He plants his disease germs on your bread. He buries them in your butter. He drowns them in your baby's milk bottle. There is no escape if he once enters your home.

There is only one safe way to guard against him, and that is to keep him out of the house by screening your doors and windows.

The fly does not convey the bacteria into the human system by biting, as the mosquito does, but carries the disease germs around with him in his body and clinging to the hairs of his feet.

Fly season is at hand. What are the good housewives going to do about it? Do they intend to allow these hot weather pests and breeders of disease to multiply from a few flies into a million eggs and from a million eggs into tens of millions more flies? If not, an early campaign is in order.

Appreciated More and More

The book, Calendar and photogravure were duly received, for which please accept my many thanks. I prize the book and picture very much. The latter I intend to frame. I have taken THE CHRISTIAN HERALD only one year, but feel that I could not get along without it now. I have enjoyed every number, and after I finish reading them, I mail them to a relative living in New Jersey. MRS. R. S. I.

THE DEAF AND BLIND IN KOREA

Mr. Yi, Teaching Deaf-Mutes, Pyeng Yang, Korea

Pongnai O, Korea's First Blind Pupil

An Animated Conversation at Pyeng Yang School

By Rosetta Sherwood Hall, M.D.

FAR away in heathen lands one of the trials of the Christian missionary is to realize his limitations in meeting and relieving not only the spiritual, mental and moral dearth, but the physical defects and distress that press and depress upon every side.

The condition both of the blind and of deaf-mutes in Korea is truly pitiable: the latter are considered imbeciles, while the former are never taught anything useful, but become fortune-tellers or vile sorcerers if their parents are well enough to do to have them thus trained; otherwise they are often neglected—half fed and clothed, kept in some dark corner, and in some instances when found had been sitting on the floor until unable to walk, but when placed in the hospital under proper treatment became able to go about as others. Others were about to be disposed of with a dose of opium when rescued and are now happy, contented school children.

There are several thousand deaf-mutes in Korea for whom the mysteries of life are fought with the animal instincts only; they have souls, but do not know it; they live in a perpetual silence which the voice of no regular evangelist can ever penetrate.

And for the thousands of blind, who walk in real physical darkness amidst the mental and spiritual darkness of Korea, even more than for the seeing, Christian education is the only help and the only hope.

My interest was not again stirred in the subject until I took up medical missionary work in Korea, when my heart was often touched by so many coming to the dispensary with eyes already sightless, and too often "hopeless" had to be written in the record book, and I knew too well it meant not only hopeless as far as the little patients' eyes were concerned, but hopeless for their whole mental and moral condition. Sometimes the mother, having heard of somebody's eyes having been healed by the foreign doctor, had traveled many weary miles with her blind child tied to her back, and the way she would prostrate herself in her Oriental way before me, beseeching me to "give sight," was heartrending. I longed to do something for these sightless ones, but my hands seemed so full, and then in those pioneer days of the work in Korea some thought the heathen would not understand what we wanted to do with blind children, and that after they had been with us awhile or in time of riot they might point to them as proof of the false tale sometimes rehearsed about doctors' taking out children's eyes to make medicine.

In the spring of 1894, when baby Sherwood and I accompanied Dr. W. J. Hall for the first time to the city of Pyeng Yang, we found there a little blind girl, the eldest born to Mr. O., the first Christian convert there, and I thought, "Here's my chance to begin; her father is a Christian, and will not misinterpret my motive." So I set about contriving a way to prick Korean oiled paper with a needle to teach little Pongnai. But we were early recalled from our work in Pyeng Yang because of the Chino-Japanese War, and before I could return, my husband died of typhus fever contracted at the seat of the war, and I left for the United States with my son Sherwood.

But I did not forget blind Pongnai. While in America I had a talk with Superintendent Wait, of the Institute for the Blind in New York, about his system, and received much valuable help from him. Upon the return of myself and children to Korea, in the fall of 1897, I at once set about adapting the "New York Point" system to Korean, after having compared it with other systems in vogue and being satisfied it answered best the tests of correspondence and utility. By using spare moments and as a recreation from my medical work, I had succeeded by spring in transcribing the Korean alphabet, syllabary, Mrs. Jones' primer and the Ten Commandments. A little later, upon taking my work up again in Pyeng Yang, I began teaching Pongnai. It was slow and tedious work at first, press of other duties often preventing the necessary time being given to it, but little by little Pongnai mastered the alphabet and the syllabary, and then it was plain sailing. In one year she could read readily all I had been able to prepare, and she learned to write in point and to make her own lessons from dictation. I also taught Pongnai to knit; and patients, seeing her industrious and happy, would ask if other blind girls they knew of might join her. And when our Pyeng Yang Girls' School was built, Mrs. DeWitt Clocke of New York City, whose blind brother makes her kin to all blind, gave sufficient to build a classroom for blind girls, and has ever since contributed to the support of some of the girls. Much credit is also due the Hancock and Middletown auxiliaries of my own district (Newburgh), who supplied what help was needed for Pongnai all through her years of training, and now raise her salary as a teacher for the new blind pupils.

During its first decade our work for the blind was limited both for lack of funds and of time and good help; yet ten blind girls benefited by its training; their souls were saved and in almost every case they proved the means of bringing salvation to their families; thus instead of deepening the darkness about them with the sorcery of the heathen blind, the Christian blind are a means of enlightenment to others. This is the object of our educational work for the blind or deaf: to make them intelligent, happy, useful members of Christian home circles. Out of the work also during its first decade have grown Miss Perry's class for blind boys in Seoul, and Mrs. Moffett's in Pyeng Yang.

Once when I had Pauline Yi, the second blind girl, to enter the school (no relation to Pastor Yi—Yi, Kim, Pok and O all being common surnames in Korea) with me in Seoul, Hon. Yun Che Oh of the National Educational Bureau invited us with Mr. Rockwell to his home to meet the acting minister of education and members of this board, together with other prominent Seoul men. Pauline gave before them a demonstration of our methods: reading, both Korean and English, letter writing, arithmetic, geography and knitting; she also sang some Korean national songs and Christian hymns, accompanying them upon the organ. You should have seen how amazed those grave Korean gentlemen were. Dignified officials with gold or jade buttons would sit beside Pauline upon the floor better to examine what she was doing. After the gentlemen went out their wives came in, and were also so deeply interested we could scarcely get away.

Another time in Pyeng Yang we arranged a programme to be executed by the blind girls, inviting Bishop Harris and Dr. Jones, both of whom are cordial friends to this work; also the Korean governor, Mr. An Chang Ho, and some other prominent Pyeng Yang men interested in educational matters. My rooms were crowded with an interested and enthusiastic company, and quite unsolicited the native gentlemen handed in their cards with promises of nearly fifty yen for the work.

From the first it has seemed to me best for the blind girls to be taught together with the seeing girls, and mingle in their games. The reason for large institutions for the blind and deaf lies in the fact that for so many years they were neglected—left out of the race altogether—and philanthropists, at first thought, brought them together in special institutions. But this is not essential; in fact is detrimental. For even though a special teacher be added to a school staff here and there for the beginners, the expense would be much less than the support of special institutions—the blind or deaf child would be kept in touch with the other children, which is of great advantage. To illustrate, three of our blind girls finished the work of the lower school two years ago together with three seeing girls, having used in "Point" the same text books and having had the benefit of whatever had been taught the seeing girls with but little more tax upon the teachers. The oldest of the three, Pongnai O (baptized "Prudence"), remains in the school to teach the new girls and to help the seeing teachers with the other blind pupils who are now scattered in threes and fours through all the grades of the lower school. The two younger girls, Pauline Yi and Fanny Chyo, entered the Union Academy, where their work compares favorably with their more fortunate schoolmates. Mrs. Moffet, M.D., who teaches them physiology, reports them among her very best pupils.

Beside the work already provided for we need as follows:

Ten $25 scholarships for needy pupils; $60 salary for special teacher for deaf boys; $60 salary for special teacher for deaf girls; $60 salary for special matron of girls' dormitories; $500 for stereograph plant to produce Bibles and text-books in sufficient quantities for the blind, and for industrial work for both the blind and deaf; $5,000 for dormitories for deaf and blind boys; $5,000 for dormitories for deaf and blind girls.

WITH OUR BOYS ON THE FRONTIER

What the Y. M. C. A. Is Doing in the Camps on the Mexican Border

EVER since the beginning of the present extensive movement on the Mexican frontier the Army Y. M. C. A. has been actively at work in the military camps. Reports received by the International Committee of the Associations in New York from its representatives in San Antonio show the character of the work now going on and incidentally disclose some interesting glimpses of the camp-life. One secretary writes:

"With the 11,000 men in camp here at San Antonio, Texas, I am daily realizing anew how great is the need for all the effort we can put forth to help them in their leisure moments. Tent No. 1 is always busy. For our first week we have had an attendance of about 10,000 men, and the amount of mail matter sent out is something like 700 letters a day. We started in to give something every night, having moving picture shows three evenings in the week, and planned for a band concert the alternate evenings, but we find that many prefer not to have the band concerts so frequently; they hear the bands every day and it is nothing new for them. Their real preference is to come to the tent, where it is quiet and restful, and read and write, with no greater disturbance than the spasmodic efforts of the talking machine.

"On Monday morning at 3 o'clock, while Mr. Hicks and I were on our way to Galveston, a playful Texas whirlwind came through camp and Y. M. C. A. stock was "on the rise." The sentry on post at brigade headquarters said that when the whirlwind struck the tent, it filled like a great balloon and went up in the air about twenty feet, falling down in an utterly collapsed condition. All our electric lights were broken, and it took the boys until almost evening to get the tent erected and straightened around again.

"My visit to Galveston was most interesting. The general is our friend. I went to headquarters and met him and found him anxious to do anything possible for our work. They turned over Barracks Building No. 33 for our use; it has just been completed at a cost of $33,500, and is a beauty. From the entrance to our Y. M. C. A. tent are paths radiating out to the respective companies of the various regiments camped near us, paths so clearly marked that they look like the laying out of the spokes of a great wheel, and those paths are hardly ever deserted. I rose at a quarter of seven Sunday morning, and upon opening my tent flap, I looked over into the big tent and already there were four men at the tables, writing letters home. The tent was not unoccupied from that moment until the notes of the bugles sounding taps floated across the camp at ten o'clock at night.

Barracks No. 33 at Galveston, Texas, in Use by the Y. M. C. A.

"Sunday evening Dr. Bleim, of San Antonio, one of the principal physicians and an active layman, made the address. His subject was "Clean Manhood" and he spoke for nearly an hour to an audience of men, and I never saw a more attentive audience anywhere. I had, as my organist, a major of the Third Artillery, and General Hoyt, commander of the Third Brigade, was on the platform, while his personal staff were there in the audience. Dr. Bleim must have had conferences with twenty-five to thirty men after the close of the services.

"We hope to get our Bible class working soon. We need a separate place for meeting, and it is almost impossible to get a time at which all the men can assemble. I know, as far as our Sunday services are concerned, they are a success and will increase in popularity.

"A second large Y. M. C. A. tent has just been erected at San Antonio, and two secretaries are at work. A third tent is in operation for the colored troops, with a colored student secretary in charge. Officers are asking for a fourth tent. At San Diego four tents are in operation with three men in charge. The commanding officer telegraphed the Association at San Francisco, urging the secretary to come down and organize work similar to that carried on last summer at the large encampment."

A letter from a Y. M. C. A. worker in Galveston, Texas, says: "What a crowd we had yesterday afternoon and evening! The first day we opened up the work in Barracks No. 33 we did not have one-quarter enough tables or chairs. I suppose there were 500 letters written. I have ordered ten ten-foot tables and fifty ten-foot benches, and I know the benches won't accommodate a quarter of the crowd we'll have at the entertainments and meetings. To-night we start the moving picture shows and expect to run them four nights a week. This will keep hundreds in camp at night who otherwise would go to Galveston, which is a 'wide-open' town. We gave our moving picture show last night, and between 1,500 and 2,000 men came. We had at one time over 200 men in the social room, and all the time from twenty-five to forty men writing letters. We are finding a great number of men who know of the Young Men's Christian Association. A considerable number are Christians and Bible Class members, so we are planning for immediate organization of a big Fellowship and Bible Class Club. The opportunity for good work is here. Remember us in prayer. We have a great opportunity here to serve men and the service is full of inspiration."

Preaching, song service, tent meetings and much personal work among the troops will be continued without cessation while the encampment lasts.

TOPICS OF INTEREST THROUGHOUT THE WORLD

AN INDEX to the value of such old and rare volumes as are offered for sale only once or twice in a lifetime was clearly shown at the auction of the library of the late Robert M. Hoe, of New York. Many of the books brought prices that would be quite snug little fortunes in many parts of the country. The famous Gutenberg or "42-line Latin Bible" brought the world's record price for a single book—$50,000. Mr. Henry E. Huntington was the purchaser, and by this acquisition succeeds Mr. J. P. Morgan as the owner of the most expensive book in the world. This Bible was printed some time between 1448 and 1455 by John Gutenberg at Mainz, Germany. Its greatest claim to distinction lies in the fact that it is one of the first books ever printed from movable types. The work is printed on vellum and is one of seven which are known to exist.

—THE WAR ON the mosquito is on again. The Board of Health in Montclair, N. J., is carefully inspecting all pools, ditches and drains for "wigglers." Even tin cans, pans and bottles are inspected. One "wiggler," they have figured out, may be the progenitor of 7,623,292 mosquitos in a single season! A fine of $10 a day has been fixed as the penalty for having a mosquito breeding-place on any property.

—IN CONSEQUENCE of the anarchistic conditions in Morocco, France will reinforce her troops already there by sending thither immediately four battalions selected from the Colonial army. The troops will embark at Toulon. Their destination will be the region of the Chaouia. The internal situation of Morocco is growing steadily worse. Several tribes hitherto faithful to Sultan Mulai Hafid have thrown in their lot with the rebels. The position of Fez, and the danger to the lives and property of foreigners, is considered critical. The rebels are reported drawing a circle around the capital, whose only hope of safety lies in the Sultan's army commanded by Captain Bremond. Dispatches received in Paris by way of Spain indicate that sedition is rampant in Fez itself, with food growing scarce and communication with the coast daily becoming more difficult.

. —SPOKANE, WASH., has lately tried the experiment of eliminating politics in municipal affairs, and with much success. Government by commission is the term applied to the new order of things. Five commissioners were chosen from among ninety-two candidates at a special election on March 7, when women voted for the first time. Mayor Pratt and ten councilmen retired, giving place to the new order which included the installation of Rev. William J. Hindley as Mayor and Commisioner of Public Affairs, with Commissioners of Finance, Public Utilities, Public Works, and Public Safety, all of the four last named being successful business men. Thus far, the experiment has worked smoothly and with evident satisfaction to the taxpayers. Nashville, Tenn., adopted government by commission in the early 80's and Galveston, Texas, also tried the experiment some years ago.

—THREE MEN WERE arrested recently in Indianapolis on charges of complicity in the plots which resulted in the blowing up of the offices of the Los Angeles Times and the Llewellyn Iron Works at Los Angeles, Calif. These men were John J. and James B. McNamara and Ortie E. McManigal, all of whom are more or less closely identified with labor unionism. The arrests were made upon the instigation of William J. Burns, head of the National Detective Agency, who with his staff has been working on the case ever since the Times disaster in October, 1910. The police and detective claim that their investigations have produced a chain of evidence which proves the guilt of McManigal and the McNamara brothers, not only of this crime but of similar outrages. It is also said that McManigal has made a most startling confession, in which he admits his connection with the destruction of over 100 lives and many millions of dollars' worth of property. Those who speak with authority for the labor unions, however, are united in their denial of the charges against the men arrested and the imputation which the arrests make against all organized labor. They claim that the arrests were illegally made and that the men were spirited out of Indiana without a chance to consult counsel or to fight extradition. All connection with the dynamite explosions that have occurred during the last few years in connection with strikes is also denied by the Labor Federation leaders. Efforts were made to free the accused men within a few hours after their arrest, those who were directly connected with the legal procedure being themselves arrested on warrants sworn out by the labor leaders on charges of illegal apprehension. The discovery of stores of dynamite, nitro-glycerine and percussion caps, which the detectives claim were made by the arrested men, is already being investigated by the authorities of several towns and cities. Labor leaders throughout the country are thoroughly aroused and are planning a great legal battle for the liberation of their fellows. Congressman Berger has introduced a resolution in the House of Representatives calling for a Federal investigation of the entire case.

The Bible Above All Books

WHEN Johannes Gutenberg 460 years ago set up his newly devised movable types and his cunningly constructed hand-made press at Mainz and invented the "admirable art of printing," one of the first books he made was a Latin Psalterium, with the Psalms, Antiphones and Collects arranged for choruses for Sundays and holy days. This was the first notable specimen of the new art which was destined to revolutionize history. Gutenberg, like Caxton and Wyclif, had wider views than the printing of the Psalter. He labored early and late at his invention, that he might put the whole Bible into the hands of the people. After years of toil he succeeded in completing a Latin version of the Scriptures now known the world over as the 42-line Latin Bible. A copy of this Bible, printed by the old inventor himself with his own types and presses, was sold at auction in New York on April 24. It consisted of seven substantial volumes bound in vellum and was part of the famous library of the late Robert Hoe. It brought the unprecedented price of $50,000—the largest sum ever paid for a Bible or any other book since the world began. The purchaser, Mr. Henry E. Huntington of California, is to be congratulated on his rare prize, for which the leading book collectors of America and Europe were in hot competition with him.

This event has a double significance. Although the Mainz Psalter, Gutenberg's first book, was sold in London not long ago for $24,750, the Bible brought more than double this price and is therefore, even from the bibliophile's point of view, the most valuable book in the world. Moreover, the event makes still more memorable this tercentenary year of the Authorized Version. Now, as it was in Gutenberg's day, the Bible is the most highly prized of books.

If the old printer of Mainz, who died poor and almost friendless after laying the foundation of the art that has done more than all others to uplift the race, could have looked forward through the centuries to the world-wide appreciation of his handiwork, he would have felt repaid for all his toil and suffering. It is gratifying to know that this first printed Bible—the forerunner of the countless millions of Bibles now in use—is to remain in America. It is a prize of which any nation may well be proud.

The Mania for War

The desire to die on the field of battle and give your life for your country, after slaughtering a reasonable number of enemies, is patriotic in its way, and Colonel Roosevelt and others who want to be killed on the battlefield are at least anxious to die usefully.—New York Evening Journal.

WE TAKE leave to differ with our contemporary. Why should there be any occasion for war at all? Is not slaughter on the field or elsewhere the poorest use to which a human being can be put? In this supposedly civilized age, with the science of law so well understood and so widely recognized, why should it be necessary to resort to sheer brute force to settle differences between nations and governments any more than between individuals? If there were no laws to meet the emergency, the man who went out with a shotgun to settle an apparently irreconcilable quarrel with his neighbor might have some colorable excuse for his act; but any one attempting such a course to-day would be an outlaw and a criminal. Law affords all the facilities for the settlement of every conceivable form of human dispute. This being the case, why should it be right, justifiable, honorable for any government to go to war with another? We have a high respect for the sagacity of our contemporary; has it no word of condemnation for the greatest of all crimes against justice and against the progress and happiness of the race—the black, odious crime of war? We can conceive of the noble sacrifice of one's life for another, or for science, or invention, or for any high ideal that looks to helping the race of men to better things; but wherein consists the glory and honor, or the praiseworthiness of men who have no earthly quarrel with each other—and who are not deadly enemies but rather friends—slaughtering one another to gratify the ambition of some despotic ruler bent on conquest or revenge, or on some pretext of honor; or because selfish trading and commercial interests have stirred up war with a view to greater trade or larger territory? Armies are but an aggregation of pawns moved by master hands on the chess board of fate. All the human sacrifices and sorrows that follow the great movements on the board, while they may make the world weep, are viewed with equanimity by kings and cabinets so long as they themselves are safe. Baron d'Estournelles de Constant, a distinguished European peace advocate, has openly charged that the actual losses of human life in this great "royal game" of war have been purposely concealed and misrepresented by monarchs and ministers, lest the truth should appal and shock and lead to revolution. The great need of the nations to-day—a need that is felt especially by the workers of every land—is the establishment of an international arbitral court, with power guaranteed by a sufficient number of signatory governments to carry out its decrees. This is the hope of the world; it is what the wise, progressive and enlightened element in all lands is longing, working and praying for.

Finders of Continents

THERE are the makings of a great historical controversy in the claim recently put forth by a Mr. Petherich (who is said to be an accepted authority), that the continent of Australia was discovered by Amerigo Vespucci in 1499. This honor has been variously claimed for the French explorer Le Testue, for Magellan, Portuguese, De Torres, Spanish, and Tasman, Dutch. Petherich now claims that Vespucci was the real discoverer. In May of 1499 he went out with Alonzo de Ojeda and three ships, and was gone sixteen months, in which time he had sailed 26,000 miles. The real dates of Vespucci's American voyages have never been definitely ascertained. He wrote a long account of his discoveries and declared that in 1497 he reached "a coast which we thought to be that of a continent," and he claimed to have come to the mainland long before either Columbus or Cabot. Although investigation has not cleared up his American voyages, if it should result in according him the glory of finding the Australian continent, it will be something of a late atonement for the neglect of this remarkable adventurer, in whose honor the old German teacher and mapmaker, Windseemuller, affixed the name "America" to his first map of the New World—an appellation which has withstood even the well authenticated claims of Columbus to prior discovery.

Mother's Day

WHEN Miss Anna Jarvis set aside the second Monday in May to be devoted to the memory of her mother, she probably little thought that her filial devotion would soon find an echo throughout the length and breadth of our Union. The comfort which she derived in paying special tribute in this way to her mother's memory, caused her to begin, three years later, a movement for the general observance of such a day by sons and daughters everywhere. The growth of the sentiment in favor of a "Mother's Day" has been unprecedentedly rapid, until now it is sacredly kept on the second Sunday in May by many thousands in forty-three States of the Union as a thank offering for the gift of good mothers.

The badge to be distributed and worn on Mother's Day is a white carnation, or whatever may have chanced to be your mother's favorite flower. If no flower can be had, the national colors or the official badge which is issued, may be worn instead. A special programme is prepared for the use of schools, Sunday Schools and societies of all kinds.

Miss Jarvis advises that love for one's mother be shown especially on this day by visiting her with gifts and affectionate words. If she has passed on before, give something to a needy one; a cup of cold water to the thirsty, a favor to those who are sick and in prison, a kind thought to another mother. A man whose beloved mother died two years ago, has sent his carriage two or three times each week ever since in order that an aged friend of that mother, who otherwise would be unable to go abroad at all, might enjoy the rides no longer possible for her whom he had so deeply loved.

Those of us who cherish the memory of devoted and self-sacrificing fathers, hope that some time they may receive their meed of honor also, if not by a day set apart to their memory, yet still in some equally beautiful and fitting manner.

A Continental Movement

WHAT promises to be one of the most extensive religious campaigns ever undertaken in a systematic and business-like manner, is planned by the "Forward Movement," the centre of the organization and the initial momentum being New York City. It is proposed to conduct revival services in ninety cities simultaneously, in which it is planned to have practically all the leading Christian churches of the country participate, as well as the Y. M. C. A., the Gideons, the Laymen's Missionary Movement, the International Sunday School Association, the Civic Betterment Societies, and similar organizations. This spiritual battle all along the line, it is announced, will last five months, ending in September. With the spiritual element there will be allied a strong social service feature. Primarily, the movement will be directed toward reaching the non-church-going masses, and thus to strengthen the Church by increased membership and by a wider contact with those who have been living in a social environment heretofore beyond its reach. Such a work, undertaken, as we doubt not it will be, in the right spirit and with proper spiritual preparation, cannot fail to become a blessing to multitudes and a powerful energizer to the Christian Church everywhere. We pray that it may be made the means of bringing thousands into the kingdom and of greatly augmenting the Christian forces of this nation.

General Notes

—ACCORDING TO SOME RECENT statistics New York must be awarded the palm for the greatest producing capacity in proportion to its population of any city in the world. Included in these recent statements are the following facts: New York has 8,000 church workers (salaried), 6,000 lawyers, 5,000 physicians, 24,000 educators, 40,000 employees in the printing trades, 45,000 office workers, 58,000 in the liquor business, 220,000 laborers and mechanics, 290,000 store-keepers and 600,000 factory employees. New York has many working inhabitants who do not represent families living there. They have come from homes outside the city and are not counted as part of New York's population. Then there is a vast amount of work done in New York by commuters, not credited to the city in its population, but who toil in New York daily, and their accomplishments go to the credit of the city. The careful observer in New York would say that it is a city of shops, and so it is, miles on miles of them, up one avenue and down another, on both sides of the cross streets and in every direction presenting their wares to the eye. For small shops it is a wonder and it is often asked, "How do they all live?" and for big shops, that house villages of people, it leads the world. Yet the shopkeeper does not outnumber any other class of workers, for more persons are engaged in manufacturing goods than in simply selling them.

THE BIBLE AND NEWSPAPER

Conducted by FERDINAND C. IGLEHART, D.D.

New York Public Library

THE New York Public Library is one of the largest libraries, and its home is one of the most magnificent buildings of the kind in the world. The library is the result of the consolidation of the Astor Library, the Lenox Library, and the Tilden Trust, which occurred in 1895. The trustees determined that the institution should not only be for the use of scholars, but of the common people, and that it should be made a positive practical help to all who should care to share its benefits. In searching for a site for the great building, Bryant Park, on Fifth Avenue between Fortieth and Forty-second Streets, the location of the old reservoir, was selected. By an act of the legislature the reservoir was abandoned and leased to the city for the purposes of this great library. The style of the architecture is Renaissance and the building is of white marble. The front is on Fifth Avenue looking east. Although the building was under roof in November, 1906, it is just now completed, and the books are being carried from the other libraries and placed on their shelves in the new building. No architecture could be more beautiful and no appointments could be more complete to the minutest detail in its furnishings. John Jacob Astor gave $480,000, which founded the Astor Library. Among the officers and trustees named in Mr. Astor's will were Washington Irving and FitzGreen Halleck. These books are now being taken at the rate of 20,000 a day to the new building. New York City is rich in its sky-scraping buildings, in its factories, its stores, its banks, its ships, its railroads; but above all these are the treasures of written truth that shall adorn the shelves of the great literary palace and enrich the minds of the citizens who may thirst for knowledge. Our God is omniscient and good books are the emanation of his mind and the choice treasures of his children's hearts. Paul in his instruction to Timothy recognized the necessity of clothing for the body, and also that of books and documents for the mind and soul, as he said:

The cloak that I left at Troas with Carpus, when thou comest bring with thee, and the books, but especially the parchments. (II. Tim. 4:13.)

Lost in the Battle

The revolutionists in the Battle of Agua Prieta on the Mexican border, recently were defeated not by the federal forces but by their own folly and sin. They defeated themselves by getting drunk just at a critical moment when to have remained sober would have given them an important victory. The battle was going in their favor, and feeling that they had gotten the victory, they commenced celebrating by drinking large quantities of intoxicants common to Mexico, which made them brutally drunk, and instead of achieving the victory which was theirs, they turned and ran in ignominious defeat. Next to the skill and valor of the Japanese army, the vodka of the Russian soldiers was the greatest enemy to the Russian cause. In the battle of life drink turns many a victory into defeat, it bankrupts the young promising merchant, spoils the practice of the brilliant lawyer and physician, and when taken to excess defeats men and women upon every battlefield of life. The defeat of the insurrectionists from drunkenness reminds us of the capture of the city and the death of the king after Belshazzar's monstrous drunken debauch with his thousand lords.

In that night was Belshazzar the king of the Chaldeans slain. And Darius the Median took the kingdom. (Dan. 5: 30, 31.)

The Bible and Nations

The tercentennial celebration of the King James Version of the English Bible under the auspices of the American Bible Society was one of the most memorable meetings ever held in Carnegie Hall, New York. Able and appropriate addresses were made by Bishop Greer of the Protestant Episcopal Church, Bishop Warren of the Methodist Episcopal Church, Hon. John W. Foster, former Secretary of State, Right Hon. James Bryce, British Ambassador, and Professor William Lyons Phelps of Yale. The following message from President Taft was read: "I desire to express my deep interest in the recognition which is being taken in this country of so notable an event as the three hundredth anniversary of the King James Version of the English Bible. The publication of this version of the Holy Scriptures in the year 1611 associates it with the early colonies of the English people upon this continent. It became at once the Bible of the American forefathers. Its classic English has given shape to American literature. Its spirit has influenced American ideals in life, laws and government. I trust that this celebration may continue and deepen the influence of the Bible upon the people of this Republic." Ambassador Bryce then read the following special communication from his sovereign to the meeting: "I rejoice that America and England should join in commemorating the publication, three hundred years ago, of that version of the Holy Scriptures which has so long held its own among English-speaking peoples. Its circulation in our homes has done more than perhaps anything else on earth to promote moral and religious welfare among old and young on either side of the Atlantic. The version which bears King James's name is so clearly interwoven in the history of British and American life that it is right we should thank God for it together. I congratulate the President and the people of the United States upon their share in this our common heritage." King George's letter closed with an exhortation to international peace as taught in the Bible. The Ambassador then delivered a short address in which he dwelt upon the simplicity, dignity and beauty of the Bible, and said it was about the only book in which the translation was as good or better than the original. He showed how the excellence of our great writers is traceable to their knowledge of the diction of the Bible, and mentioned four great masters of the English tongue who adorned the last generation and who were familiar with the Scriptures from childhood. The four were John Bright, Abraham Lincoln, Cardinal Newman, and Thomas Carlyle before his style became Germanized. British and American character has been largely formed by this Book," he said, "because it was in the seventeenth century the only book which all the people knew and all the people revered." After Bishop Warren had spoken ably on the Bible in the world's education, Professor Phelps made a short address on the English Bible and Literature, in which he said with great emphasis that a chapter of the Bible ought to be read in every public school in America every day, which sentiment was lustily applauded by the great representative audience assembled. The world has gone a long way toward the fulfilment of the mission of the Scriptures when the heads of the two most powerful nations of the earth, whose law, literature, commerce and religion have been created by the Christ of the Book, should pay these official tributes to the value, the necessity of the Bible as the guide and saviour of the world. The Emperor of Germany and other rulers have paid similar tribute to the value of the Bible to individual character and national life. This thought runs through the 119th Psalm:

Thy word is a lamp unto my feet, and a light unto my path. (Ps. 119: 105.)

First Called America

Early in June the city of St. Dié in the Vosges, France, will celebrate the four hundredth anniversary of the publication of the Cosmographiae Introductio, in which this continent was first termed America. Mayor Ducel and various civic and philanthropic societies have undertaken a preparation for a Franco-American celebration and have enlisted the support of the national government. President Fallières of the French Republic will be present and the principal address will be delivered by the Minister of Foreign Affairs. Ambassador Robert H. Bacon, Consul-General Frank H. Mason, and many other Americans, have promised to be present, as will also the representatives of twenty American republics. J. Pierpont Morgan cabled from Egypt his acceptance of an invitation. The programme will include a military review, a historical pageant, the installation of a tablet on the house where the name America was first written, and the laying of the cornerstone of an obelisk on the peak of Mount Ormont, to be known as America's Tower. The celebration will be good for the little city that is arranging for it, and for the nations that will participate in it. We fail to see any reason why this continent should ever have been called America. It should have been named North and South Columbia, and to have named it after Americus Vespucius seems to us to have been unjust and ungrateful. This great nation, however, has sanctified the name, and history will ever give it. Some geographies tell us that the Norsemen discovered the Western hemisphere well on to a thousand years before Columbus set sail, but these are mere traditions. History goes back to the man who set his feet upon the shores of the new world and claimed it in the name of his Saviour. Whoever was or was not the discoverer of America, Columbus undertook to carry the cross of Christ to India by a new route, and he stumbled on San Salvador. God sent him to open a gateway to the new world for the spread of his Gospel and civilization.

His name shall be continued as long as the sun; and men shall be blest in him: all nations shall call him blessed. (Ps. 72: 17.)

Heroic Rescue

Annie and Eddie Reith, aged four and six years respectively, went to Mount Park, New York City, with a settlement worker. The children, feeling that there would be more fun at the river, slipped away and went down to the Harlem River. As they stood on the pier watching the waves strike upon it, Eddie, who was the custodian of his sister, kept his hand on her belt. The wind blew the girl's hat off, and in her attempt to catch it she lost her balance and fell into the river, her brother going with her. People on Willis Avenue Bridge saw the children fall and set up a call for help. Christopher Kenny, nineteen years old, heard the cry of distress and ran hurriedly some distance to the scene of the accident. He threw off his sweater which he wore as he ran, and plunged off the dock for the rescue. The girl had by this time drifted forty feet away from the pier, while the boy was a little closer to the shore. Kenny swam hand over hand and rescued the girl as she was disappearing for the last time, gathered her in his left arm and made for the boy. He was not visible, but he swam to the place where he saw him go down. The boy appeared for a moment and then sank again for the third time. Kenny thrust his hand down and fortunately caught the boy by the hair, pulled him up, gathered him in his right arm, turned himself over on his back, and thus swam backward to the pier. The boy and the girl were almost dead. People on the shore let a line down to Kenny, who trod water while he fastened the rope first around the girl and then around the boy, who were lifted to safety; and then he himself was pulled up by the rope. The unconscious children were rolled on barrels till the ambulance came, taking the girl to the hospital and the boy to his home. Young Kenny did not think that he had done anything worthy of special mention. In fact, he is in the habit of doing such things, for this is the third rescue of the kind which this young man has made. In the ordinary walks of life, amongst the plainest people, we have exhibitions of as rare heroism as was ever displayed on the field of battle or rewarded with plumes or epaulets. There seems to be a revival of the evangelistic spirit, the instinct for saving souls, especially those of children. No service can be more beautiful and divine than this for saving children from temptation and ruin. The divine salvation of children is expressed in the words of the prophet:

He shall gather the lambs with his arms, and carry them in his bosom. (Isa. 40: 11.)

Questions and Answers

Questioner, Ontario. 1. My husband and I before marriage were members of a certain denomination. Now we live three miles from a church of that denomination and five minutes' walk from a church of another denomination. We have been attending the latter church for convenience. What is our duty?

Both denominations are doing a splendid spiritual work. No one would dare to say which is the better. You can serve Christ well in either. Weigh the matter well, pray over it, and then follow the leadings of your conscience.

J. H. A., Yonkers, N. Y. William Dean Howells, in his reminiscences of Mark Twain, says he was at one time in the church, but he lost his interest because, he said, conditions now were no better than they were thousands of years ago under the pagans. Was there any justification in saying this? In other words, are we no better to-day than we were under the heathen?

Such a conclusion was absurd on its face. Any one who, in the light of history, cannot see that the world under a Christian civilization is better in every way than under a pagan system, must be a pessimist by nature as well as by profession. Pagan morals and philosophy, as well as social conditions, cannot be contrasted with conditions to-day in Christian lands, and no sincere student of history will attempt it.

R. DeM., Chicago, Ill. How are we to interpret I. Thess. 5: 22? In the most comprehensive sense would it not possibly lead us to avoid many things which, no matter how they may look, are really not wrong at all, but sane and proper?

The original Greek is somewhat strained in the Authorized Version. It not only tells us to abstain from all appearance of evil, but from every form of evil. Evil sometimes presents an alluring form; it is not always repellant. Then, even assuming the thing in question to be, as far as we ourselves are concerned, no evil at all, it may be a real evil to others. For their sakes and in order that we may not by our example subject them to danger, we are to refrain.

W. B. P., Independence, Ia. 1. Does the Carnegie Pension Fund for Superannuated Teachers apply to teachers in our public schools? 2. If not, please give conditions upon which such pensions are granted.

1. No. 2. They are granted only to regular professors or assistant professors in colleges (which must have a certain endowment). Such professors upon reaching a certain age, if in good and regular standing, will receive pensions upon simple application.

A. D. W., Rogers, Mich. 1. Was Jesus really born on December 25? 2. If not, why do we celebrate that day?

1. The exact time of Christ's birth is not anywhere recorded. In the writings of the Church fathers, during the first three centuries, no mention is made of any celebration of the nativity. It was the taste of the age to multiply festivals, and it doubtless occurred to the Christians that, since Christ's death, resurrection and other events in his life had each been memorialized by an appropriate celebration, it was proper that his birth should be also. Since at about the same time the ancient winter holidays (Saturnalia, Juvenalia, Brumalia) were transformed into seemly celebrations by the Christians, it is likely that they did so with a view to using that period of joy as a tribute to their Saviour's birth, instead of to the glory of pagan divinities. 2. We celebrate the day because the custom as thus established has come down to us through the ages.

A. P. F., Aransas Pass, Texas. 1. Please explain Matt. 24: 21, 22, and what is its relation to Daniel 12: 1-3 and 10? 2. Is Christ's prophecy here, in some respects, identical with that of Daniel in the above quotations?

1. Matt. 24, Mark 13 and Luke 21, all deal with the Saviour's prophecy of the destruction of Jerusalem and the signs of his second coming. He had gone out of the temple never to return, and this discourse practically ended his public ministry. The "abomination of desolation" pointed to the Roman ensigns as the symbols of an idolatrous and cruel pagan power. The expression of Daniel is applied to the profanation of the Jewish altar by Antiochus Epiphanes. The flight to the mountains here foreshadowed actually took place afterward when the Christians fled to Pella in northern Perea to escape the calamities that overtook the Jewish nation. The forceful language of Matt. 24: 21, 22 is not unusual in the New Testament when applied to great calamities. All commentators agree that this special prophecy, up to a certain point, applied to the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans. Beyond that point, expositors are divided, some holding that it applies to the Lord's second coming and to the day of judgment, and others still adhering to the idea of judicial vengeance on Jerusalem, culminating in the breaking up of the entire system of which that city was the centre. There is little doubt, however, that the Master's purpose was rather to point to his own coming and the final judgment, since it was impossible that the generation then living could witness the fulfilment of the prophecy in its entirety.

C. H. B., Delway, N. C. 1. If a man be dead to sin can he be converted and forgiven of his past sins? 2. Explain John 5: 39.

1. Nothing is impossible with God. We have no right to say that any man is beyond redemption. The sinner who truly repents and turns to God for pardon and for help to live a better life will not be rejected. 2. "Search the Scriptures." There has been much difference of opinion concerning this passage, some holding that it should be read: "Ye search the Scriptures" and not as a command, but as a rebuke to them for having searched and for failing to find that which was most precious—the testimony of the prophets to the coming of Jesus as Messiah.

J. L. H., Rogers, O. Please explain Rev. 20: 2, 5.

The first passage refers to the beginning of the millennium. Many have interpreted it to mean literally a thousand years, while others accept the term as implying perfection—that during a certain time the world would be perfectly pervaded by the Divine. Verse 5 means that it will be the first resurrection—the resurrection of the just (see Luke 14: 14).

C. H. B., Troy, N. C. 1. What became of the Ark of the Lord? 2. Please explain Rev. 3: 21. 3. What was the promise made to Abraham referred to in Gal. 3: 29?

1. Nowhere stated. 2. It means that the victorious saints shall share his honor and shall sit with Christ and judge and reign over the nations. The Oriental throne is a sort of divan, admitting others besides him who as chief occupies the centre. 3. See the "Covenant promise," Gen. 17: 6, 7, 8.

Irig W., Ijamsville. 1. See sermon in April 19 issue, which covers your point. 2. We cannot judge. There is too often a disposition to judge people harshly, ministers included, and Christian people should strive to avoid this. 3. Many a one is misrepresented and unappreciated, even though trying to do the best and live up to a high standard. We should not do good for the sake of winning praise, but to please God and our own conscience. 4. We cannot advise on the other questions.

S. W. G., Altamont, Kan. What were the deeds of the Nicolaitans—Rev. 2: 6?

They were a sect which, while professing Christianity, tried to introduce into the church a false freedom and a degree of licentiousness which were fatal to true spirituality. They abused the doctrine of divine grace by making it a plea for loose living. See II. Pet. 2: 15, 16, 19 and Jude 4.

W. H. W., Edgewater, Col. Much has been written concerning the apparent discrepancy in the two genealogies in Matthew and Luke, but it seems now to be the general view of commentators that both these genealogies refer to the paternal side. Joseph's family had suffered adverse fortune and it is surmised that the reconstruction of a complete family record back to David may have been a difficult task. According to Eusebius, King Herod had caused the family records of all the Jews to be burned, consequently they would have to be recompiled with difficulty and the variations in Joseph's case may thus account for the apparent double lineage. It is evident, however, that the two evangelists, though giving the register as they interpreted it, regarded it as purely secondary to the accepted fact of Jesus' divine origin.

W. L., Idaho Falls, Idaho. Is the evidence fairly conclusive that one of the Popes was a woman, and if so, which one?

The story to which you refer is that some time in the ninth century, the papal chair was filled by a woman (known as the Popess Joan). It is now admitted by practically all writers of authority to be a fable.

G. V. V., Brookline, Mass. The questions you raise would involve a protracted and fruitless discussion, since no one can go beyond the words of Scripture. The Bible tells us that God gave to man a living soul. In this sense he was in the image of his Maker in his dispositions, temperament and desires, and in his obedience to the divine will; but this condition was forfeited through sin. It could only be said thereafter of those who walked uprightly before God and were inspired of him, that they were "his offspring." Matt. 13: 38; Mark 7: 10. See John 12: 36; Acts 13: 10; Col. 3: 6. Jesus himself drew the distinction when he told the wicked scribes and Pharisees that they were the children of the evil one and this is the actual condition of every one living in sin unrepentant and unforgiven. Thus while in his perfect condition man was like his Maker, in a condition of sin he is no longer so, nor has he any of the spiritual attributes and qualities that belong to the perfect condition, or even of the pardoned sinner, who has the hope through Christ of reconciliation and restoration. The Bible nowhere declares that man is of himself and inherently immortal. "The soul that sinneth, it shall die." When sin entered, then came physical decay and death; man's first condition was lost and with the continuance of sin, and unrepentant and unforgiven, he also forfeited spiritual immortality. Eternal life is the gift of God. Paul declares that Jesus, through his Gospel, brought life and immortality to light for fallen man and showed the path to restoration through repentance, forgiveness and acceptance.

J. M. B., Passaic, N. J. Please explain Gal. 6: 17.

The marks or brands or stigmata are here meant. In those days, slaves were branded with the names of their owners. Paul gloried in the marks of the sufferings he endured as the servant and bondman of Jesus.

Mary S., Detroit, Mich. Will you please explain John 3: 36?

It means that whosoever believeth on the Son has eternal life now; it does not belong exclusively to the future world nor begin there. It begins here, and is spiritual and timeless. We begin here to live forever (see verse 18, also chapter 25, verse 24).

Miscellaneous

Mrs. J. H. E., West Philadelphia. The author of the hymn, "A poor, wayfaring man of grief," was James Montgomery.

G. T. Christmas is kept as a festival in honor of the birth of the Saviour. The New Year celebration has no relation whatsoever to the same cause.

B. P. H., Montague, P. E. I. You will find the historical gap between Malachi and the Gospels (nearly 400 years) best accounted for in Josephus' history of the era of the Seleucidæ, wars of the Maccabees, etc.

H. A. P., Youngstown, O. God's mercy is boundless and we cannot set limits to his love and forgiveness. If we are truly repentant and ask his forgiveness he is "faithful and just to forgive." (See I. John 1: 9 and related passages.)

J. L. B., Fresno, Calif. One who is mentally defective to such an extent that he cannot distinguish between right and wrong, is not responsible for his actions. This is the attitude of human law, and it is reasonable to suppose that in the spiritual world his responsibility would be limited. Those who, knowing his mental defect, lead him into wrong actions, are certainly responsible (see I. Cor. 8: 9, 13; Rom. 14: 21). We cannot answer your other questions.

Mrs. W. H. H., Stewart, Minn. 1. "God made man in his own image," says the Scripture. 2. Darwinism is not taught, but human evolution is taught in some of the colleges. 3. It is Christianity without Christ. 4. The church standards and the commentaries of learned and holy men are the best expositors of Scriptural meaning. 5. The Jews to-day are split into two great divisions—Orthodox and Reformed. The former hold the essentials of the ancient faith; the latter are liberals, and while not discarding Judaism wholly, reject much that the orthodox hold in reverence.

A May-Day Fete in the Park

INTO the life of our nation we are weaving the festivals and celebrations of many lands. It is ours to choose those whose beauty and pretty sentiments appeal to us and to reject those which are distasteful to the genius of our people. Of all the dainty and joyous fetes we have made our own, perhaps none can equal the May-day festival which we have adopted from our cousins of old England. All the joy of spring was typified in this early summer holiday. The whole-souled villagers of England thus greeted the coming summer and saw in the symbolism of the bare brown pole, which was finally clothed with the windings of its particolored streamers, the clothing of earth with the glories of summer.

In the great cities, where the children cannot go to the open country for their May-day celebrations, the parks become the playgrounds of thousands of parties such as that shown in the picture. Innumerable children dance and gambol about the green. The old-time meaning of the fete, as well as its customs, is well preserved. The children crown their Queen of the May, and in the spontaneous joy of the day tell of their gladness for the chance to run once more hatless and coatless in the open fields.

A Canadian Pastor's View

Just a word of appreciation of your splendid paper. I have taken it now for some years, and find it most interesting, inspirational, and educational. It often brings me help in my sermonizing, as well as information relative to the expansion of the kingdom of God among men, and encouragement and inspiration in my own spiritual and devotional life. I am an admirer of our late brother and co-worker, Dr. Klopsch. He was a Christian hero, and a world-benefactor. I appreciate his picture, and have framed it for my study. The volume of his biography has also come to hand, and I am pleased with it. God bless you in your work, and God bless all who in sincerity are with us in the common work of the Master.

$15,000 More for China's Famine

The Christian Herald Fund Has Now Sent $117,100 to the Relief Workers to Save the Starving

ALTHOUGH the season is now far advanced toward spring and the harvesting of the new wheat crop in the Chinese famine provinces is looked for a few weeks hence, the general distress continues with little abatement. An additional remittance of $15,000 was cabled by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD through our State Department in Washington on April 25, of which $7,500 was apportioned to the Shanghai Relief Committee and a like sum to the Missionary Relief Committee at Chin-kiang. This latest remittance makes the total of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Relief Fund sent to China to date $117,100, inclusive of the Buford's food cargo.

Chairman John C. Ferguson of the Shanghai Relief Committee writes: "The distress is even greater in Northern Anhui than here (Kiangsu). The missionaries in Kiangsu who assisted in famine distribution in 1907 all state that present conditions, even in this district, are worse than they were at that time. Crowds of hungry men, women and children await the distribution of the small amount of relief we are able to give them."

The relief movement continues to find friends and supporters throughout the country among good people of all denominations. China they recognize as the greatest missionary field in the world, and the present suffering they confidently believe may yet become the means of opening many doors of service to the missionaries who have been engaged in distributing relief.

Famine Refugees Who Have Received Relief Tickets, Waiting for Food at Chin-kiang

E. M. Paulson of Barron, Wis., who sends a money order for $7.81 from Pleasant Hill Sunday School to be added to the relief fund, writes, "During seven years of mission work among the Chinese, I have learned to know them as a patient law-abiding people—a people who will feel grateful for any assistance they may get in their present distress."

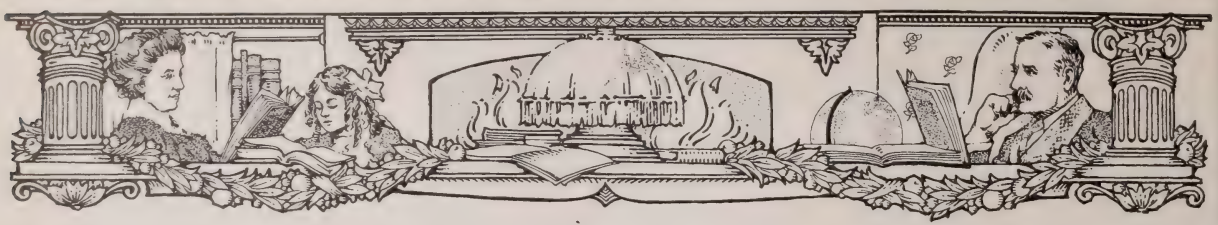
Superintendent Edith Smith of the Loyal Temperance Legion of LaMesa, Calif., sends $10, the proceeds of a candy and food sale, to help the famine sufferers. The writer of the letter, Miss Frances E. Bishop, adds: "This will be a helpful lesson for them in the future to remember this in time of need." Paul H. S., a little lad of thirteen of Pierce, Col., sends $5 "to give some starving boys food." "I do wish I was a millionaire," writes Mrs. C. M. E., Fredonia, N. Y., "I would be glad to give freely; but I have passed my eighty-first birthday. I enclose a dollar. May the dear heavenly Father open many hearts to give liberally of their abundance." The graded school children of Shelby, N. C., collected $30.75 for the sufferers, which was forwarded by Miss M. L. Ivie, who writes, "May it help to relieve some poor perishing soul." Dr. R. S. H., of Waverly, N. Y., sends $2 and writes, "This is in a sense conscience money—at least, my conscience would give me no peace until I had decided to send it." G. A. S., Alfred, Me., sends $1 and explains, "Mrs. Alice D. sends this by me. She is a widow with three children to support; but she has a heart big enough to care for others who are needy. May God bless your grand relief work." "I hope my contribution may not be too late," writes Sarah C. M., New Galilee, Pa. ($6); "I sincerely hope that the famine will soon be past and that they may again enjoy plenty."

Mr. L. W. Felter, of Denver, Col., writes: "With the co-operation of the Ministers' Association of Cañon City, we had a meeting there for the China Famine Fund and I enclose gross results, $47.69 (making no charge for my stereopticon lecture). I am thankful for the privilege of being used for this good cause."

"I want to be represented in this relief work," writes E. H., Bucklin, Mo., "and I send this small amount ($5), and my granddaughter Jewel, six years old, hearing of the poor little suffering tots in China, wanted to send a little of her own bank collection. She says, 'I want to send a whole dollar.' May God bless this small gift of $6 and make it the means of some soul's salvation." M. H., Watertown, N. Y. ($1), writes, "Am much interested in your great mission of love and mercy, and wish I were able to contribute a large sum. Please find enclosed $1, which, with my prayers, I trust may do a mite of good to the suffering ones. Have long been a reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and am confident of the fidelity of the promoters of this charity." Eva M. Pasley, of Sycamore, Kan., writes, "Enclosed find order for $3.65 to be used for the relief of the China sufferers. This collection was taken last Sunday night by our Epworth League. The League has only been organized a short time and this is our first collection for missions." Surely, no Epworth League could be in better or nobler service than this.

Mrs. J. K., Bernardsville, N. Y. ($2), writes, "I sincerely hope that God will bless your efforts to help the starving and that they may be the means of bringing many of them to Christ." Secretary T. A. Stephens, of the Charlotte Harbor, Fla., Methodist Sunday School, sends $5.50, being a collection for the China famine. He writes, "We send it with our deepest sympathy and earnest prayers."

"When I read in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of the great suffering in China and how mothers are trying to sell their dear little ones for food it brought tears to my poor old eyes and made my heart ache. I am a mother ninety-one years of age, and I know how to sympathize with the mothers of China; I have no children now. They are all gone before me to the heavenly country where they neither hunger nor thirst any more. The little I have I will share with some poor, heart-broken Chinese mother," writes Mrs. M. B., Peterboro City, Can. ($1.)



"I am sending a money order for $3," writes a friend in Dodson, N. M., "one for myself, one for my husband, and one for my young son. I wish it were much more." Mrs. E. L. S., Fanley, Sask., Can., writes, "My three little boys each had a dollar given them and they want to send half of it to China, so I am enclosing you $1.50 for them. They think it awful that so many should be hungry there." "Use this to relieve the suffering of some of the children in the stricken districts," writes M. A. R., Elizabeth, N. J. ($5). "May God abundantly bless your work by pouring upon you contributions from all parts of this country so that we may soon hear the good news, 'We are able to help every poor sufferer in China.'" Miss Susie Bausch, secretary of the Helena, S. D., Sabbath School, writes enclosing $5, the gift of the pupils, and adds, "May God bless the great work you are doing and may the day soon come when this state of things will no longer be."

THE MISTRESS AND THE MAID

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

Is There a Stigma?

A CORRESPONDENT writes with some bitterness on the subject of domestic service. She inquires whether a stigma is not attached to it in this country, where our ideals are republican, and we are supposed to have no separation of classes. She contends, and with reason, that it is just as worthy an occupation to do housework in a family as to stand at a loom in the factory, to make paper boxes, to sell bonbons or ribbons, or to engage in any other line. She is quite right. She would be right if she went farther and declared her conviction that housework, if done well, requires as much application, intelligence and attention as painting pictures, writing poems, caring for the sick, or editing newspapers. Work is work, and when well done work is honorable.

There is something peculiarly un-American and snobbish in the spirit which looks down upon those who serve us in our homes, who make our lives comfortable, and set us free to engage in other occupations ourselves. There certainly is no real stigma attached to domestic service in the mind of any reasonable human being.

Years ago it was my happy privilege to conduct a large Bible class. On the class list were the names of fifty young women, and I recall with vivid pleasure the fact that they represented almost every form of womanly culture and womanly usefulness in the community. There were students, teachers, girls in society, saleswomen, factory operatives, artists, one actress, and one nursery maid on my class roll. In the class itself and in our frequent social meetings outside the class we met on equal terms, and there was never a shadow of condescension, patronage or anything of the sort to mar the harmony of our intercourse. Neither was there on the part of the less well educated and the more hard-working young women the slightest shadow of self-consciousness or the least feeling of loss of dignity or of being out of place.

If we could but remove from the mind of houseworkers the sensitive feeling that they have in reference to the work they do, if we could persuade them to accept as part of their obligation the comparative aloofness from the family life of their work while it is going on, half the battle would be fought and won. Domestic service is only intolerable where there is not a footing of true friendship in the situation. The woman in the kitchen ought to have a friend in the woman of the drawing-room. Not a social stigma, but a great loneliness, is the drawback to domestic service. A woman most happily placed in a family where her employers were her friends went out one evening to take a walk. She met a maid employed in a neighboring house. The girl was walking back and forth sobbing, and when she was asked what was the matter she said:

"I am really half dead with homesickness. I have no one to speak to all day long. Mrs. Blank never says one word to me except to give me an order. She keeps me on the outside of everything. I don't know what to do. I have good wages and it's an easy place, but I'm leaving it at the end of my month."

Quite different was the recent experience of a young girl from Sweden engaged to do the general housework in a little family of three, up town in New York. When she came to her first place in this country she could speak little English, and she had almost no knowledge of the simplest routine in an American kitchen. She was patiently and affectionately steered through the reefs and shoals of early difficulties. She gradually learned to comprehend and speak the language strange to her. Then she was taken ill, and for several months was unable to do any work. When she was assured that she should be taken care of until she was well again, that she would not be cast adrift, and that she had nothing to worry about, her gratitude was unbounded.

On the basis of personal friendship alone can there be permanence in the relation of mistress and maid. The maids, however, are those who make most of an implied inferiority, who do not see the advantages of a comfortable home, and who, so to speak, too often go about ready to resent suggestions and take offense at criticisms when, on the contrary, they should be open to every hint that can be given and every bit of knowledge volunteered in order to their improvement.

As the Years Go By

A FRIEND writes that she has lately been impressed with the increasing loneliness of life as the years go onward past the meridian. One by one her dear ones have left her until she seems to stand on the shore, the last of her family, with the waves of eternity rolling in. It may easily happen that the survivor of a family may be spared a number of years. If so, what is there for her to do? The problem must recommend itself to many readers as a practical one.

A woman who has, we will say, reached her sixtieth year, who is in good health mentally and physically, cannot in these days be called old. In fact, she has merely arrived at a comfortable way-station on the road of life. She may seem old to a girl of eighteen, because young people are not in a position to gauge accurately the difference between their smiling springtime and the ripeness of maturity. A woman of sixty in the twentieth century may very easily be no older in reality than a woman of forty was in the eighteenth century. In the Far East, where girlhood is so short a time, age comes to women sometimes soon after thirty, a time with us of glorious bloom and fulness of beauty. The woman left alone in her later fifties or early sixties should take hold of life with courage and foster her friendships with unabated interest. We must continue to make friends day by day and year by year, never letting go the chain without stopping to repair a weakening link. One of the best things to do, as one grows older, is to keep as close as one may to the vital pulses of life as they beat in the hearts of the young. Let the college boy come to the woman who is growing old, telling her of his plans and hopes. She, as readily as his own mother, sometimes with quicker understanding, listens patiently to the story of his first love. Let the young girl run in and talk over her affairs in the twilight. Have an open mind to every one who brings a trial or a triumph for discussion, and though the love of kindred may be lacking, the love of friends will grow constantly sweeter and more precious.

Everybody's Aunt Jane

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is greatly honored by having on its subscription list a venerable lady, who may be called Everybody's Aunt Jane. If only we might all of us walk with such queenly dignity toward the evening of life! How profound would be our gratitude!

Mrs. Jane E. Farington, Westfield, New York, has passed her ninetieth birthday, as bright and active as ever. Her eyesight is so clear that she has hemstitched in the last year two dainty white tablecloths and pieced two silk quilts, blending the colors beautifully; every stitch fine and neat. Mrs. Farington, or "Aunt Jane," as she is universally called, because she is aunt, great-aunt, great-great-aunt, great-great-great-aunt, was born on the banks of old Lake Erie very near the beach, but not a trace of the old road that passed the cottage can be seen now. She has always lived within a few miles of her birthplace. She has a kind word and a loving deed for every friend and neighbor, and her home is a restful sunshiny place, which attracts young and old. Aunt Jane lives by herself, but is never lonely. Long ago she learned the sweet secret of peace, and although her years are so many, she does not seem old, nor is she ever afraid. In winter there is often a group around her big wood fire, blazing cheerily on the hearth, as it did long before most of us were born. When THE CHRISTIAN HERALD comes, Aunt Jane reads it from the first to the last page, and there is not one in the great company of subscribers who takes a keener interest in it than she.

Morning Prayer

"I WONDER if any of you know the morning prayer for grown folks corresponding with the children's 'Now I wake and see the light'? It is:

> Now I rise and set to work,
> I pray thee, Lord, I may not shirk.
> If I should die before the night
> I pray thee may my work be right.
> "J. N."

The spirit of this prayer may be commended to grown people, not alone to the lazy ones.

The Race for Position in the Astoria Kite-Flying Contest

MORE than 150 kites of all colors, sizes and shapes were in air nearly two hours at a contest held a short time ago by New York Public School boys at Astoria, L. I. A British war kite took the altitude prize with an ascension of 3,500 feet, while the "farthest out" record was made by a Roumanian war kite which hung out in space at the end of a line 8,000 feet long. Among the different types of kites entered in the contest were the buzzing or whistling, the cobweb, the cylinder, the Antoinette or aeroplane, the box, war, and many others of comic and freak design.

FRIENDSHIP IN THE COZY CORNER

"Thy friend will come to thee unsought;
With nothing can his love be bought;
His soul thine own will know at sight:
With him thy heart can speak outright.
Greet him nobly, love him well;
Show him where thy best thoughts dwell."

A Friendship Garden

IN THE foot-hills of the Adirondack Mountains, far off from the trail of the traveler, and by a small blue lake that takes its name from the curve of a meerschaum pipe, there is a beautiful camp. The soft-sounding Indian name of it means Here-the-Deer-Lodge. Off to the right of the spacious, well built Lodge, there reaches a grove of sixty trees or more, known at Here-the-Deer-Lodge as

Friendship Garden

UPON the boles of the trees in Friendship Garden, dates and names are variously carved; for the trees have been set out and marked by guests at the Lodge, and every one represents a friend of mine host.

For a great many years, each guest at the Lodge has been asked to set out a tree, and carve his or her name on its stem. These trees are very beautiful now, and there are names there that have grown famous. Many of you girls and boys would know them well. To walk in Friendship Garden is to feel, first of all, the golden bond of friendship that binds with almost a magic spell that sacred place.

Ah, how dearly I should love to tell you more about it, if only I had the space. But think of it for yourselves. A Friendship Garden! It is so full of suggestion, so full of life and love.

Homey, Welcome Letters

NOW, so many of you older girls, and ever so many older boys as well, have been writing such homey, nice letters to me that I feel I should like to start and plant out, in the Cozy Corner, A Friendship Garden. Will you come and help me, please? We can meet now and again right here in the Cozy Corner; and besides that, we can write to each other as often as we like.

We shall soon grow acquainted, and almost before we know it we shall be friends.

A Pathway in Friendship Garden

There are names there that have grown famous. Many of you girls and boys would know them well.

A Golden Blessing

FRIENDSHIP is one of the golden blessings of the world; for after all, when we stop to think of it, we are healthier and happier, our lives are richer and saner and more worth while for friends. There is no gainsaying this, is there?

You may love music and your flower gardens, birds and sweet home life. And I may love traveling, and books, and the social world, and little children. Are not our lives richer, then, for knowing one another?

We shall grow interested in each other's lives, and I shall do all I can to increase your opportunities, to help you attain the things that you desire. And, who knows? Perhaps with the helpful companionship of one another, here in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Cozy Corner, we shall soon be putting color and gladness and friendship into each other's life.

Will You Come to My Party?

I SHOULD love to have all you older girls come to my Cozy Corner Tea this week. I shall invite the boys another time, you may be sure. My Tea is a letter-writing Tea. If you will write to me, I will write you; and straightway we shall have started in the Cozy Corner A Friendship Garden.

A Cup of Tea

P. S.—Because my letter has grown so long it has crowded out a sweet, lovely picture, called "A Cup of Tea." Two girls in the picture are chatting and gossiping, and having a cozy time together. The original painting from which my picture is taken is in the New York Metropolitan Museum of Art, and I shall take great pleasure in inclosing a copy of it to all of you older girls who write and introduce yourselves to me this week.

With my love, and hoping to hear from you all.

How One Woman Cleaned Her White Parasol

"I made a strong suds of Ivory Soap and, with a soft hand brush, I scrubbed the upraised parasol with the Ivory Soap suds. I scrubbed hard, rubbing the streaks through the center of the sections lengthwise, until all the stains were removed. Then I rinsed thoroughly by pouring water over the parasol and ended by sprinkling blueing water from a water sprinkler. The parasol, upraised, was placed in the sun to dry. The result was delightful. Snowy white and just a little stiff, it looked like new."

Ivory Soap is primarily a bath, toilet and fine laundry soap; but, because of its purity, it can be used for scores of purposes for which ordinary soaps are unsafe and unsatisfactory. The cleaning of white parasols is a case in point.

LITTLE PEOPLE'S CORNER

THE DREAM-FAIRY

A LITTLE fairy comes at night.
Her eyes are blue, her hair is brown,
With silver spots upon her wings,
And from the moon she flutters down.

She has a little silver wand,
And when the good child goes to bed,
She waves her wand from right to left,
And makes a circle round its head.

And then it dreams of pleasant things,
Of fountains filled with fairy fish,
And trees that bear delicious fruit
And bow their branches at a wish.

And singing-birds with gifted tongues
For singing songs and telling tales;
And pretty dwarfs to show the way
Through fairy hills and fairy dales.

THOMAS HOOD.

DEAREST BOYS AND GIRLS: Do not think, because I have written a letter to your older brothers and sisters this week, that I am neglecting you. Not a bit of it.

This is the month of fairies; and if you will write me little letters about your favorite Fairy Stories, I will gladly send prizes of five books of best fairy tales to the five girls and boys who write best letters this week. There are many smaller books for extra prizes. So be sure, all of you, to write and try for a book of fairies.

Our Good-Night Verse

When thou liest down thou shalt not be afraid; yea, thou shalt lie down and thy sleep shall be sweet.

Hoping that the Cozy Corner mail-bag will be bulging and bursting with May letters from you all, and wishing you gladness and success with your flags, lovingly and faithfully,

Some Clever Work by Our Boys and Girls

PORTLAND, April, 1911.

DEAR AUNT IN THE COZY CORNER:

That is the dandiest prize book you sent me. It is just fine, and I thank you ever so much for it. It has been snowing this week, but the fruit trees are all in bloom, and the garden is up, and it is just like summer.

Please send me some Good-Time Plans. A little friend of the Cozy Corner.

Two brown eyes,
One little nose,
Two pink ears,
Ten little toes;

Sweet little mouth
Just ready to kiss;
Pray tell me what
Is sweeter than this.

THE ATTIC

I love to go to grandma's;
I bet you don't know why.
No, 'taint so much the sweets,
Nor yet my favorite pie.

I'll tell you the first letter,
And then see if you know.
It starts with "a," now guess it;
'Taint to eat, and doesn't go.

But now just get your wits to work;
You'll never guess the rest;
So I will have to tell you;
'Tis the attic I love best.

If you had all the fun I have
When I go there to play,
You'd like it well as I do,
To go and spend the day.

The Calvert Mortgage and Deposit Company

PAYABLE ON DEMAND AT ANY TIME AFTER TWO YEARS

THESE certificates are issued in even multiples of $100.00.

They bear interest at the rate of 6 per cent., payable in semi-annual installments, January 1st and July 1st.

They run for two years, or longer, from date of issue, and may be withdrawn at any time without notice, after the expiration of two-year period.

These certificates are issued at this time to meet an insistent demand for exceptionally good loans from the very best sections of the South. The prosperity and rapid development of the South make it an extremely desirable field for investment just now.

Applications for loans on improved property in the very best of the towns and cities of Georgia and Mississippi, where our organization is the strongest, have been largely in excess of our ability to accommodate for some time.

In order to help us meet this demand and at the same time extend the advantages it offers to our customers, this issue of 6 per cent. certificates has been authorized by the Directors of this Company.

You will readily realize the ample security back of these certificates when we tell you that we are required by law to keep deposited at all times, with some Trust Company, mortgages to the amount of 75% of our assets. In compliance with this requirement of law, we have on deposit at this time with the Union Trust Company of this city, mortgages to the amount of $800,000. This deposit secures our Certificates. As these mortgages are never more than 50% of the value of the property upon which they are a lien, you can readily see that the security behind these certificates is ample.

The Company's Record

During the past sixteen years the Calvert Mortgage & Deposit Company has loaned about $2,000,000 on real estate, chiefly in prosperous cities and towns of the South.

Whether or not a Mortgage Company has been conservative can always be judged by the amount of real estate taken in under foreclosures.

Our statement shows only five pieces of real estate taken in at an aggregate cost of $5,500.00. The rental value of this property is $62.00 a month, or a gross income of 13% of our investment. No better illustration could be given of the careful manner in which we handle our business.

The loans made by the Calvert Mortgage & Deposit Company are all small, ranging in size from $200 to $4,000. More than 1000 such loans are on the books of the Company at the present time, and they represent as sound a line of real estate investments as can be shown by any institution in the country.

Loans are made only on First Mortgage. Every piece of property is carefully examined by the Company's expert appraisers, and as there are always more applications than can be taken care of, only the best are accepted.

The loans are put into the form of notes, payable in monthly installments and are secured by first mortgages on the property itself. Thus the borrower begins immediately to pay the principal, and as the mortgage remains unchanged until the debt is discharged, the margin of security becomes greater with each succeeding month.

16 Years of Substantial Growth

During the sixteen years of this Company's existence it has paid 5 per cent. on its Certificates, withdrawable on demand.

It has also from time to time issued 6% certificates, running for two years and payable on demand at the end of that period, or at any time thereafter.

And in these years there has never been a day's delay in the mailing of interest checks, or in the payment of principal when due. No customer has ever lost a dollar or been caused inconvenience or delay even in times of financial stringency.

The Present Issue of 6% Certificates

Offers every essential of a desirable investment.

1. They are safe. Mortgages on property valued at least twice the face of the certificates afford absolute security.
2. They are liberal in interest returns; 6% is as high a rate as money can earn without the sacrifice of safety. There is nothing speculative about these certificates.
3. They are easily convertible into cash; certificates continue to draw interest as long as the money is left in our care. They are payable on demand at any time after two years. They can be used at your bank as collateral for a loan if it is desired to raise money before the expiration of the two-year period.
4. The denomination is small, hence the certificates are available to almost any one who has savings or surplus funds to invest.

In fact, it would be difficult to find a safer, more liberal, more altogether satisfactory form of investment than is offered in these 6% certificates.

As the issue is not large, it will be necessary to send subscriptions at once.

SUDDEN FORTUNES

IN NINE cases out of ten a sudden fortune is a misfortune. If it were possible to pour at once into the brain of an illiterate man all the knowledge of all the world's books in all languages, the possession would leave him even more helpless and vastly more confused than he had been in the days when his life was controlled by his instincts and his experiences. If a healthy, normal boy of nine were suddenly endowed with the stature and strength of a giant, he would at once become a danger to himself and a constant menace to his associates. The value of great knowledge, great strength, or a great fortune depends altogether on the training the possessor has had in the acquisition of such powers; and without this training, this education, the possession is very apt to prove a curse.

An Illustration

The reader whose memory goes back for thirty years or so will recall the case of the notorious "Coal Oil Johnny," an illiterate country boy, born in northern Pennsylvania nearly twenty years before that region sprang into prominence as a great petroleum field and the hotbed of sudden fortunes. Unlike the central and southern parts of the Keystone State, this section has never been distinguished for the fertility of its soil. Before the discovery of oil the value of land, away from the towns, was estimated by its timber growth; and two generations of merciless cutting and destructive forest fires had in many places reduced this to a worthless, forbidding scrub.

Drills had been invented, and under the direction of geologists and mining engineers these drills passed through the thin soil, pierced the overlying strata of rocks, and tapped the liquid fountains of light and heat for the comfort of the many and the enrichment of the few. Farmers who did not estimate their total possessions at more than a few hundred dollars suddenly found themselves owners of tens of thousands, sometimes of hundreds of thousands; and a majority of them were more helpless with their wealth than they had been in the times when every dollar was the product of toil and sweat and grinding thrift.

A book detailing the manner in which these sudden fortunes were used would make reading at once interesting and instructive; but in most cases the humor and the gladness would be found drowned in the tears of tragedy and disappointment. Through the death of his guardians "Coal Oil Johnny"—his family name we have forgotten, nor does it matter—suddenly found himself a millionaire. Stories current at the time credited him with an income variously estimated at from twenty to fifty thousand dollars a day; and this would continue so long as the oil wells on his land continued to flow.

A Spendthrift Trail

Johnny was not naturally depraved; indeed, had he been permitted to continue on the lean farm, he would without doubt have been an honest, hard-working man, doing his duty as he saw it within his cramped limitations. But he was an ignorant boy, suddenly endowed with a giant's strength, and utterly at a loss how to use it. Had his mind been properly trained, Johnny, with his youth and his money, might have become the world's oil king. Soon the keen-eyed vultures found Johnny, and seeing him fat and helpless, they proceeded to devour him. They took him out and showed him the world; they called it "life"; and he had a gold-encased magnifying glass with which to examine its details. Johnny dressed in garments more expensive than tasteful, and he clothed his many parasites in the same raiment. Johnny flashed with diamonds; so did the parasites. Johnny hired minstrel troups for his own entertainment, carried them around in a special train, and the parasites went along. Had the wells been spouting liquid gold instead of crude petroleum, Johnny would soon have been living up to his income. As it was, he soon exceeded it; and then he began to draw on his principal, and the oil wells began to "peter out."

It is not necessary to continue the career of "Coal Oil Johnny." Within a few years the fortune was gone; so were the parasites; and the young man went back to the old home and took up the old work, as well as his shattered health would permit. This is a true case, and we do not introduce it as a warning, but simply as an extreme illustration of the misfortune of a sudden fortune mismanaged.

In 1908 Edward Morton—we use a fictitious name, but some of our readers will no doubt recall the real one—owned and lived on a fifty-acre farm on the Kentucky shore of the Ohio River. He was forty-five years of age, but, having married young, he had five children, at this time all well grown up, the youngest being a girl of eighteen, and the next, also a girl, aged twenty-one. The oldest son was married and managed a harness shop in the neighboring town; another boy helped his father on the farm, and the third was a pilot on a river steamer. Like the father and mother, the children had received what is known as "a good common school education," and although all had ambitions for a broader life and a wider horizon, they were reasonably content, and were fighting the life battle as best they could in that part of the field to which Providence had assigned them.

The Unexpected Happens

Church members, healthy, honest and industrious, the Mortons might be pointed to as a typical American family. Seeing that we have no authentic record of its ever happening, "lightning out of a clear sky" is a serviceable illustration of the unexpected. If the lightning from a clear sky had actually destroyed his home, Edward Morton could not have been more astounded than he was when a letter from Oregon informed him that a bachelor brother, from whom he had not heard since they were boys, had just died in that State, leaving him, in immediately available cash, one hundred and fifty thousand dollars. And so it was that while he and his wife were still in life's prime, and their children grown up, Edward Morton suddenly found himself the possessor of what he regarded as a great fortune.

Knowing his own limitations, Mr. Morton went down to Cincinnati to consult an old friend who had become a prosperous business man in that city. This is what the friend said: "Ed, you are a farmer and are too old to take up a new business. Invest your money so as to make it interest-producing. At five per cent., which you can get from selected mortgages or from sound railroad or other good bonds, you will be in receipt of an income of six thousand dollars a year, which is twelve times what you are clearing now, so that you will be able every twelve months to reinvest, in the same way, the greater part of your income. Do this, and by the time you are sixty you will have about doubled your money. I am a director in a trust company and will gladly help you."

"But there are the children," protested Morton. "I want them to get some good of their uncle's money."

"Hold on to that money while you live. Enlarge your house, if you wish, and turn over the farm to one of the boys, but keep on working. Your oldest girl is a teacher; let her keep at it. Send the youngest, till she is twenty-one, to a good school, and let the boys fight it out as if their father was still a poor man."

When we know a given property, as a result of thorough personal investigation we are in position to advise bond buyers as to the values we have found, and our reputation stands back of that advice.

We are frequently able to offer the investor bonds yielding from 5% to 6% with a security that is quite equal to that of the more popular (because better known) bonds yielding only 4% to 4½%.

We invite correspondence on the subject.

The scope and character of this service and the kind of bonds which we offer are described in our booklet, "The Most Satisfactory Bonds," which is sent on request without charge. Ask for booklet No. B.-67. Also for April bond circular.

Good advice this, but Edward Morton, induced to the contrary by his children, did not take it. They wanted to live in Pittsburg, where the millionaires were many and the opportunities for investment the most alluring. The little farm was rented. The harnessmaker gave up his shop, the pilot bade adieu to his wheel, and the teacher resigned from her school. A fine house was rented and expensively furnished in Pittsburg, and into this all the Mortons moved; and the girls began to think of society, and the boys began looking at the many irresistible investments that are ever on tap in that prosperous city.

It is unnecessary to give the subsequent details. Excepting the little farm and five thousand dollars invested by Mrs. Morton in her own name, on the advice of the Cincinnati friend, Edward Morton's sudden fortune has gone the way of so many other sudden fortunes. The two families, after barely two and a half years of the world, are back in the old home, trying each to pick up the life threads dropped in their crazed desire to turn the thousands into millions.

The moral, as we have indicated above, is that that which comes easily goes easily. On the contrary, anything which is acquired through a process of long continued work or slow saving is sure to be valued more highly than that which is acquired without effort. The rule is one which applies equally as well to all financial or investment propositions, as we have tried to illustrate a number of times with the axiom which has it that the greater the amount of interest promised, the greater will be the risk, and vice versa. Even inexperienced investors admit the force of this; but the greater the investor's inexperience the more seems to be enkindled the hope that in his one case the rule may be reversed, and much fortune result from a small investment.

Now, much fortune may result from a small investment, but in the course of ordinary events it cannot come to pass without the lapse of some time, and a certain compounding of interest. The great fortunes of the world, contrary to a widespread belief, were not acquired as a result of some fabulous rise in stock values. Rather have they been the result of sane investments upon which the interest, though small, has been nevertheless sure. Truly, it is better to accept a small rate of interest and have it, than to be promised a fabulous amount and lose it and your principal as well.

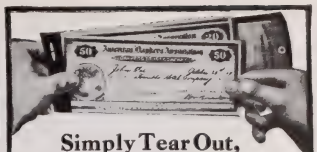
of poor, friendless men whom he has helped and cheered during the last winter. He has been present every morning at the Bread Line since Thanksgiving. He rendered the service voluntarily and gratuitously. As soon as the line began to form—generally an hour before the doors were opened—he came and spoke to every man personally a word of cheer and encouragement.

This man himself, a few years ago, was a Bowery tough, a dive-frequenter, belonging to a gang of "clothesline hangers," who made that occupation a cover for "hanging" on to many other things that did not belong to them.

Soon after his conversion, Kendall joined the Second Avenue Baptist Church, where, in the course of time, he married one of the women workers. A short time afterwards, his wife fell sick. She died last fall. During all this time, this former Bowery thug displayed the most heroic and touching devotion to his suffering wife, nursing her most assiduously, and caring for her with the tenderest care.

Then came his splendid service to his Bread Line brethren and God's prompt acknowledgment of it by opening the way to his present appointment.

And so we go on working in the deep dark passages of God's great diamond mine of fallen humanity. We are constantly bringing to the surface splendid specimens of human wealth, and demonstrating the uplifting, emancipating, disenthralling and transforming power of the Gospel of Jesus Christ.



J. G. HALLIMOND,
Superintendent Bowery Mission.

General Robert E. Lee's Will

IN a recent issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD there was printed an article on "Wills," which was reproduced from another publication. In that article reference was made to the will of General Robert E. Lee, who, the writer said, "though he fought to keep black men in chains, freed his own slaves by his will." That statement was unjust to the memory of General Lee, who was one of the bravest and best beloved sons of the South. Long before the war he had believed that slavery was an evil and in 1856 he wrote: "There are few, I believe, in this enlightened age who will not acknowledge that slavery as an institution is a moral and political evil in any country. . . . I think it is a greater evil to the white than to the black race." Nothing that could be said or written could now detract from the lustre of this great soldier's fame. As a reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in Louisburgh, N. C., pertinently observes, "The author of that statement was evidently not conversant with the cause of the Civil War, else he would have known that the question of slavery was a secondary one, and that the South fought for its constitutional rights." Although the paragraph in question did not originate with us, its reproduction in these columns gave it an importance it would never have attained elsewhere. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, as its readers well know, has no political or sectional animosities, and we are glad to do justice to the memory of a brave American, even though no slight was intended.

Six-Day Week a Success

Preparations for the six-day week, which becomes effective in the New York Post Office on July 1, were discussed at a meeting of the post office clerks in New York a short time ago. Experiments were begun a few weeks ago by giving the letter carriers a Sunday off in restricted districts, and extending it until all in the city had a day off. Later the clerks were included in the experiment and it was found possible to allow each a day by a rearrangement of the work. It has been stated that similar experiments in Jersey City, Newburg, Newark, Yonkers, and other places have been successful. No extra appropriation is provided for the new conditions, so that they must be met by a readjustment of the work. The post office officials say that when the law becomes effective conditions will have been arranged to comply with it without a hitch.

Sunday School Lesson by Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

THIS lesson has an Oriental environment which we must investigate before we can comprehend the lesson. When the prophet says, "Let me sing for my well beloved a song," he likens himself to a traveling singer with a crowd gathered about him. It is not impossible that Isaiah might have chanted his message in part. The theme of his song was a vineyard—not at all such a vineyard as we are accustomed to see, with its straight rows of grapevines, with some sort of a fence about it; but a vineyard on a hill covered with olive or fig trees, the vines festooned from tree to tree, was probably what Isaiah either saw as he sang, or had in memory. Vineyards like this may be seen all over Italy to-day. In the vineyard of Isaiah's song, all of the stones had been dug out. It is possible that the stones had been piled up, and the vines had been trained to creep over them, that there might be warm exposure for the ripening fruit.

And there was a winepress, so different from anything we are accustomed to see, it must be described: A stony place on the hillside was selected; a trough was cut along the top, about three feet deep; into this the grapes were put, and then they were pressed and the juice was discharged through holes bored near the bottom of the trough; about a foot below the trough was another trough into which the juice flowed, and from which it was drawn out through a hole bored for that purpose.

A tower is a necessary part of an Oriental vineyard. It is sometimes thirty feet square, and sixty feet high; in it a watchman was stationed that he might give the alarm when he saw marauding parties or wild beasts approaching. It was also used as a summer parlor where the master of the vineyard might entertain his guests.

Isaiah's Song

In Isaiah's song, God's chosen people were likened to a vineyard which the Lord himself had planted in the Land of Promise. Wonderfully did he hedge them about with his strong arm, giving them victory over those who disputed their right to the land, until "the God of the Hebrews" became a recognized force that must be acknowledged by the idolatrous nations. His watchtower, where he himself kept guard, was in heaven above. And God expected that his people would bear the luscious fruit of godliness. But, alas! they did not. Instead they brought forth "wild grapes," because they made friends with the idolaters instead of exterminating them, as God had commanded (Deut. 7). Therefore, God chose Isaiah to tell them just how they seemed to him. And as we have said before, a part of his message was delivered in song.

"Sing-as-he-walks" is the name of a gifted evangelist of our own time (given to him by a white man). He is a high-toned, refined member of the Choctaw tribe. He first came into notice among white people at the Mohonk Conference which was met to consider the needs of Indians and dependent peoples. His singing there was so sweet and so glorious that it brought tears to eyes quite unused to tears, and it opened the way for him to be invited to many pulpits in the States of New York and New Jersey. Subsequently a missionary was desired to be sent to the Indians in the West. Now Sing-as-he-walks had said to a Mohonk friend, "I am willing to go to China, India, Africa, anywhere, if the Lord sends me, except to the dirty blanket Indians." And the friend had replied: "You would better look out, brother man. It may be—indeed, it is probable—that these poor degraded people are the very ones to whom the Master wishes to send you, and will send you. It is always dangerous to make any reservation in one's consecration to service." And it was this same friend who was afterwards sent by a missionary board to offer him the position of evangelist to the Indians. He was found upon his knees praying, and without rising, and even before the errand of his friend was stated, he said: "Brother man, I have just told the Lord I am willing to go to the blanket Indians." He went, and among his converts were many of Geronimo's band of warlike Apaches, and Geronimo himself, whom General Miles had once called "a human tiger," because of his exceeding cruelty.—Adapted from the Christian Endeavor World.

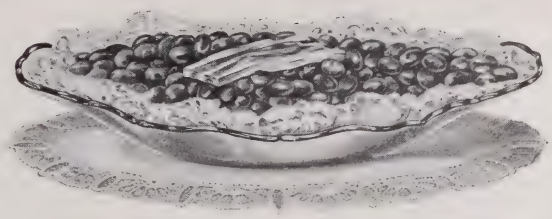
The prophet Isaiah was the most gifted of prophets. He is studied today by eminent Bible scholars more than any other prophet. It is said that "In him the Messianic prophecies reach their highest perfection. He draws the picture of the suffering and triumphing Saviour of Israel and the world, lineament after lineament, until at last he stands before us in unmistakable clearness and fulness" (Ewald). We must believe that it was something of a cross to him to go among those degraded and disloyal people to endeavor to lift them up. Song and poetry and eloquence were the vehicles which he used, and to all the world he has given the highest ideal of a preacher.

The Blight on Israel

In addition to joining themselves with the idolatrous nations about them, they had made a vile use of the beautiful vineyards with which God had clothed their hills. They had become drunken. On one occasion Isaiah said of them: "They are swallowed up of wine, they are out of the way through strong drink; they err in vision; they stumble in judgment (Isa. 28: 7). They had abused God's fruits, and in them had been developed the twin sins of idolatry and drunkenness. What a spectacle for the living God to look down upon!



And the same God looks down upon our own beloved land, and he sees what vile use men are making of the wealth of fruits and grains he is giving to us. In a recent year 100,368,805 bushels of barley, wheat, rye, corn and oats went into the breweries and distilleries. And we are not able to tell the number of pounds of grapes, cherries, peaches and apples that went into the making of 156,237,526.4 gallons of distilled liquors in the year 1910. We are becoming more and more a drinking nation, as the following table will show:

PER CAPITA INCREASE OF LIQUOR DRINKING

Year	Gallons
1880	10.08
1888	14.65
1890	15.53
1895	16.95
1900	17.69
1905	20.38
1910	21.1

The boys and girls must be told that per capita means how much each person drinks on the average. Of course, those of us who are teetotalers do not have any share in this matter; but this only shows that there must be others who are drinking more than the per capita average. This is altogether a bad showing for the United States, and we should rejoice that many men and

Does It Pay to Bake Beans Like These?

Last year we paid, on the average, $2.40 per bushel for beans. Last year each quart of tomato sauce cost us five times what common sauce sells for.

Our friends used to say that we were extremists—that such care was Quixotic—that we might save all the extra cost and people would never know it. But we are now the largest user of tin cans in America. Our beans outsell all other brands combined. And every month a new army of users changes from home-baked beans to Van Camp's. It does pay to bake beans like these.

Folks eventually find out what they like best. Some are misled for a time—some are slow to change from home baking. But we tell them again and again what we tell you here. And most people sometime get a taste of Van Camp's.

That settles the question forever.

Beans are the choicest food we have. They are 23 per cent nitrogenous—84 per cent nutriment.

They are richer in food value than sirloin beef, and cost but a third as much. They deserve the utmost care.

People who know baked beans at their best often make them their chiefest food.

But the dish is hard to prepare. It requires sixteen hours for the soaking, boiling and baking. And home-baked beans are very hard to digest. Some people can't eat them. Instead of digesting they often ferment and form gas.

The reason is lack of sufficient heat. The top beans crisp, but the beans below rarely get more than 100 degrees. So beans remain, where the faults exist, only an occasional dish.

Van Camp's Beans are baked when you get them. They are baked in steam ovens, heated to 245 degrees. They are baked in small parcels so the full heat goes through. Digestion is exceedingly easy.

The beans are not broken as they are in home ovens—not mushy and soggy and flat. They come from the oven nut-like, mealy and whole because we don't use dry heat.

And we bake the tomato sauce—like the pork—with the beans. We bake into each bean all the flavor and zest that we get from whole, ripe tomatoes.

We use only the choicest of Michigan beans. The whitest and plumpest are picked out by hand—beans all of one size so they all bake alike.

We make our sauce from whole, vine-ripened tomatoes—not of tomatoes picked green, not of scraps from a canning factory.

The result is baked beans as you like them—baked beans at their best. And so many people have found them out that we sell millions of cans each month.

"The National Dish" Van Camp's BAKED WITH TOMATO SAUCE PORK AND BEANS "The National Dish"

You cannot bake beans like Van Camp's at home. It is utterly out of the question. And you can't get such beans in any brand not prepared with equal care.

You want beans digestible—want them mealy and whole—want them as all people like them.

You ought to be glad that there are such beans ready to serve in a minute. You can have a dozen meals on hand all the time, ready for any emergency. They taste just the same when you open the can as they tasted when they came from our ovens. And that means a savor which never before was found in a dish of baked beans. Be fair to yourself and try them.

Three sizes: 10, 15 and 20 cents per can.

Sunday School Lesson

women are warning the people against liquor drinking as Isaiah did. We should rejoice that temperance lessons are now, and have been for many years, a part of the Sunday School Lesson system. We should rejoice that scientific temperance instruction in public schools is the law of all our States, and by the law of Congress in districts and territories. What would be our condition if these things were not so? We firmly believe that per capita table would give a far more terrible report. Let it be our aim to better that report, so that it shall show decrease. Is it too much to hope that we might even get it down to zero? Let us begin to reach that end by determining upon total abstinence for ourselves.

When stopping at a hotel in the White Mountains Henry Ward Beecher was asked to explain to his guests his position on the use of intoxicating drinks by Christians. He replied: "Suppose there is a precipice out by a schoolhouse, where many children are assembled. Suppose that half way down the precipice there is a spring that I especially enjoy, and, strong man that I am, I can go down there safely by a narrow path, dangerous to many, but not to me. Suppose that the children are determined to go down there after me, and will not believe that the path is dangerous, since they saw me tread it with impunity. Some of them that try fall and break their necks, and others are maimed for life. Now, what sort of a man, much more, what sort of a Christian, should I be if, under these circumstances, I persist in going down that dangerous path? Nay, verily, if I have one particle of magnanimity of soul, if I have been at all of Christ, I shall put a good strong fence across that path, and never tread it any more. That is my position on the total abstinence question."

But there are some people who think only of themselves, whether or not they are in danger of becoming drunkards, if they drink only a little. Let them take to themselves the following story:

One wintry day a gentleman standing by the upper rapids of Niagara saw an eagle light upon a frozen lamb, encrusted in a floating cake of ice, which was drifting every moment into swifter rapids. Every now and then the eagle would proudly lift its head and look about as if to say: "I know I am drifting toward danger, but I can quit any time, and with my strong wings soar away to safety." As the ice neared the falls he rose and flapped his great wings, but in vain, for while he had feasted on the dead carcass, his feet had been frozen to its fleece; and amid shrieks and vain struggles to break away, he was carried over the falls to his doom, an awful picture of many a soul which has been fastened to appetite so firmly that efforts to rise into a noble life here or hereafter have proved unavailing. A drunkard has been described as a man who commits suicide on the instalment plan.

A great book has recently come in to reinforce those who are trying to save the boys in our land from intemperance. It is called Particeps Criminis, and is written by Dr. Ervin S. Chapman. It is based on the story of a California rabbit drive. Rabbits are a great pest in California, and it is found that the only effective way to get rid of them is to build a corral, and organize a company of men armed with sticks and whips to beat the bushes, and dislodge the rabbits in hiding, and then drive them into the corral, where they are afterwards beaten to death, sometimes as many as twenty thousand being killed. The author says there is a "boy drive" going on in the United States, every day of the year, and millions of boys are being driven and corralled by the liquor traffic, only to meet their death in a short time as drunkards. This is too true. Let us be the ones to stop it!

Suppose These Were Toasted Nuts

Suppose we offered you—for 10 or 15 cents—a big package of toasted nuts. You would imagine them delicious. You'd try them, would you not?

But here's something even better.

Here are whole grains of wheat and rice, puffed to eight times normal size.

Here are toasted grains in their natural shape, yet four times as porous as bread.

Here are crisp, brown grains which—because they are puffed—actually melt in the mouth.

Here are the world's two premier grains—made into the most enticing foods ever served on a morning table.

Don't they sound good to you?

They're Used Like Nuts

These grains are used in candy making — used in place of nuts. Countless girls know Puffed Rice fudge.

Cooks use them, like nut meats, in frosting cake. Some of the finest cafes use them to garnish ice cream.

When berry time comes, people mix them with berries. In winter they are mixed with bananas. All to mix a nut-like flavor with the tart of fruit.

And 18,000,000 dishes monthly are served with cream for breakfasts. Or served like crackers in a bowl of milk, for lunches and for suppers.

Think of 18,000,000 dishes monthly. That shows how people like them when they find them out.

Puffed Wheat, 10c
Puffed Rice, 15c

Except in Extreme West

These are Prof. Anderson's scientific foods — the foods that are shot from guns.

The selected grains are sealed up in bronze metal guns. Then the guns are revolved for sixty minutes in a heat of 550 degrees. That heat turns the moisture in the grain to steam, and the pressure becomes tremendous.

Suddenly the guns are unsealed and the steam explodes. The grains are puffed to eight times normal size.

They come out as you see them—crisp, porous and brown, nut-like and enticing.

The Scientific Side

The object of all is to break up the food granules — to literally blast them to pieces.

That's the object of all cooking, baking or toasting. Digestion can't act on unbroken food granules. But no other method makes grain half so digestible as does this steam explosion.

It happens here that foods best to the taste are best for the stomach, too. That's a rare combination. Puffed Wheat and Puffed Rice are now the favorite foods with nearly all who know them.

Please tell your grocer to send enough to let you find them out.

FOOD IN SERMONS

Feed the Dominie Right and the Sermons Are Brilliant.

A conscientious, hard-working and successful clergyman writes: "I am glad to bear testimony to the pleasure and increased measure of efficiency and health that have come to me from adopting Grape-Nuts food as one of my articles of diet.

"For several years I was much distressed during the early part of each day by indigestion. My breakfast seemed to turn sour and failed to digest. After dinner the headache and other symptoms following the breakfast would wear away, only to return, however, next morning.

"Having heard of Grape-Nuts food I finally concluded to give it a trial. I made my breakfasts of Grape-Nuts with cream, toast and Postum. The result was surprising in improved health and total absence of the distress that had, for so long a time, followed the morning meal.

"My digestion became once more satisfactory, the headaches ceased, and the old feeling of energy returned. Since that time I have always had Grape-Nuts food on my breakfast table.

"I was delighted to find also, that whereas before I began to use Grape-Nuts food I was quite nervous and become easily wearied in the work of preparing sermons and in study, a marked improvement in this respect resulted from the change in my diet.

"I am convinced that Grape-Nuts food produced this result and helped me to a sturdy condition of mental and physical strength.

"I have known of several persons who were formerly troubled as I was, and who have been helped as I have been, by the use of Grape-Nuts food, on my recommendation." Name given by Postum Company, Battle Creek, Mich.

"There's a reason."

THE TRAMP'S REDEMPTION

"THERE'S a wideness in God's mercy,
Like the wideness of the sea,"
Sang the choir in the choir loft,
And it sounded good to me.
I had come there foot-sore, weary,
And my thoughts were ill at ease;
So I vowed my feet could take me
In the paths they fain did please.
At that door I paused a moment,
Wondering—should I enter there?
I could see the people kneeling,
And I heard sweet words of prayer.

Back my mind went, down the pathway
Of the long-forgotten past—
To the picture of my mother—
Oh, those years went by so fast!
I could see her as she knelt there
By my little trundle bed;
I could hear the prayer she uttered—
That I ever should be led
In the paths where all temptations
I could overcome and spurn.
Mother, if you could have seen me,
How your anxious heart would burn!

But the Lord an angel sent me—
She was such a tiny girl;
I was sitting on a door-step,
And my brain was all awhirl.
It was Sunday morn in summer,
And the church bells I could hear;
By me went the rich and poorest,
Till she came—without a fear
Of my dirt or of my tatters;
In my face one look she gave,
Then she took my hand and shook it—
Such a mite, with heart so brave!
"Does you want to come with me, man,
To the church across the way?
Sunday School is where I'm going—
You can hear us sing and pray.
And they've got a lot of water
Where they let you wash up clean—
And they like you—oh, my goodness!
You just never could be mean."

Down my face the tears had started,
And I pressed her little hand;
"Bless your heart, my little lady,
I will come there if I can."
While I stood within those portals,
Wondering should I enter there,
My eyes found that little maiden,
With her wealth of golden hair.
As she turned her head she saw me.
Then her mother turned to look;
To their pew the usher took me,
In my hand he placed a book.
Oh, I wondered! Was I dreaming?
Would this like all dreams go by?
My poor heart was almost bursting—
Now, for better things I'd try.
Up that choir rose together,
And they sang right straight to me—
"There's a wideness in God's mercy,
Like the wideness of the sea!"

Chicago's Vice Inquiry

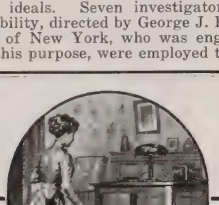
The Official Examination Thorough and Various Reforms Proposed

THE first investigation of social vice under the authority of a municipality—by appointment of the mayor and vote of the aldermen, the city paying the expenses of the investigation—has just been completed in Chicago. The report of the commission makes a volume of 368 printed pages, and represents the conclusions of a vast collection of carefully tabulated data. Minneapolis has since taken similar action, and it is hoped that the movement will become nation-wide.

The Chicago report supplies an evident need. It was prepared by a commission numbering twenty-eight men and two women of the highest efficiency from the standpoint of ability, previous training, broad-mindedness and high ideals. Seven investigators of reliability, directed by George J. Kneeland of New York, who was engaged for this purpose, were employed to obtain knowledge at first hand, their report being verified by a three times checking system. The meetings of the commission were all held in secret, ninety-two special conferences were held, which were addressed by representatives from twenty-six different reform organizations, by the police and other municipal officers, in addition to representatives of several of the churches. Fifteen million dollars in money and 5,000 unfortunate women and girls are placed as a low estimate of Chicago's annual toll to social vice.

The investigation was not confined to Chicago, but conditions in fifty-two cities were inquired into by correspondence and by personal visitation, and a world-wide survey of vice was obtained. Chicago is found to be no more vicious than most other cities, and is even better than several of the larger ones. The commission fully recognized the fact that there has been a marked improvement in Chicago in the past ten years. That Chicago's problem is the nation's problem is seen in the fact that by far the larger number of men who patronize the immoral resorts are non-resident, including travelers and occasional visitors to the city. Victims are brought in from other States and other countries. Girls from villages and rural counties, allured by promises of better wages, theatrical opportunities or other glittering promises, make up the yearly quota. Sources of danger to the young as pointed out are dance halls, the cheap theatres, lake excursion boats, the parks, massage and bath parlors, ice cream parlors, decoy newspaper advertisements, employment agencies, general post office delivery, and, always and everywhere, the saloon.

Two practical remedies are proposed: the establishment of a Morals Commission and a Morals Court. The morals commission, composed of five members holding office two years, is to keep constant vigil and pursue an aggressive campaign in ferreting out abuses and proposing remedial agencies and measures. A morals police squad, including in its number a force of mature, well-trained women, is recommended. The abolishing of fines for keepers of resorts and other violators of the law and the substitution of prison punishment and a system of probation are to be followed. Provision is also to be made for those who are desirous of reform through the establishment of homes, hospitals and an industrial farm. More playgrounds and other forms of healthful recreation are to be established in congested districts and comfort stations supplied to the down town section.



The supreme utterance of the report is in its denunciation of the Continental system of regulation of vice, and of the practice of segregation. "The Commission," the report says in the closing sentence of the paragraph of denunciation, "is convinced that the so-called system has proved itself degenerating and ineffective."

No one ought to be deterred, because of the complexity and vastness of the evil, from attempting a remedy for social vice. It is not a necessary evil, and it must give way before the combined forces of religion and common decency. REV. WM. BERNARD NORTON.

Miss Hawley's Parlor

By WILLARD N. JENKINS

[THINK, Sister Hawley, that it is your duty to give Mrs. Hawley a home."

Margaret Hawley looked at the Rev. . Ross in a perplexed way.

But I can't," she said slowly. I ven't a spare room in the house. d I can't send any of my boarders ay. I depend on the money to pay the mortgage. And by fall I shall e it all paid."

Mrs. Hawley is a worthy Christian man," went on Mr. Ross firmly. he is left without a home and with- means. It would be very hard for to go to the poorhouse; and she is r stepmother."

Yes, yes," assented Miss Hawley, ving uneasily in her chair.

'And was she kind to you when she ne to take your mother's place?"

'Kind? Oh, yes. But after all I n't know as she has any claims on . This property was left to me by uncle, my own mother's brother. hen I get the mortgage paid, I shall able to live in comfort; but I want be out of debt."

'That is right and proper, sister. t give your stepmother a home, and d will bless you."

'How can I, when I have no room her?"

'You have this room."

'This room! Why, this is my par- ."

Mr. Ross glanced around the room. e window shades were raised only a v inches under the lace curtains; t in the dim light the minister saw nily pictures on the walls, vases on e mantel, and a showy lamp and a v elegantly bound books, including a ge family Bible, on the marble- ped table. He knew that Miss wley's parlor was a grand apart- nt in her own estimation. He knew, , that it was seldom used. The arders had the use of the large, easant sitting-room across the hall.

'Sister Hawley, if 'the cattle on a busand hills' belong to the Lord, n't you think this parlor is his also?"

Miss Hawley started uncomfortably. Why, yes, I suppose so. But do you ink the Lord wants me to give up this om to my stepmother?"

"I do."

"But she is an invalid. She would ve bottles of medicine on the mantel d sunshine streaming in. The carpet uld be spoiled. Why, I should have put a bed in here."

"Certainly. It would make a very mfortable room for an invalid."

"I could take the carpet up, I sup- se," she said slowly. "But no, I ll not. If I invite her here, I'll leave e room just as it is. The carpet ght as well be spoiled as the other ings."

"The Lord may require this sacrifice you, Sister Hawley."

"I have been a member of the church, good standing, for more than twenty ars," said Miss Hawley coldly. "If is my duty to give up this room to my epmother, I can do it."

"And I think you will see that it is ur duty," said Mr. Ross, looking at s watch and rising to go.

"I suppose this room belongs to the ord, as you say," said the lady medi- tively, "and being the Lord's, no ubt he wants Mrs. Hawley to occupy . But I will confess that I never oked at the matter in such a way be- re. Do not think, Brother Ross, that y stepmother will be compelled to go the poorhouse; she shall come here."

"I was sure she would find a refuge ith you," said the good man kindly. t knew that you would look at the atter as a Christian should."

Miss Hawley bowed stiffly. Al- ough she had listened courteously to er pastor and had been guided by his pinion, she certainly was not in very racious mood.

The next day, when Mrs. Hawley was conducted by her stepdaughter into the latter's parlor, she looked about her in amazement.

"Why, Margaret, this is your parlor!" she cried. "And what is that in the corner—a bed?"

"Yes, it's a bed," grimly replied Miss Hawley. "This is to be your room."

"My room! But how can I sleep in it? And how could you give up your parlor to me?"

"I haven't any parlor. Mr. Ross told me that it belonged to the Lord."

"Then Mr. Ross was the cause of my coming here! Oh, I'm sorry! I don't want to use your good things. Why didn't you take the carpet up?"

"Because I didn't want to leave the floor bare. Don't say any more, mother. You'll find that chair comfortable, I think; it cost ten dollars. And you'll eat your supper off of a marble-topped table," finished Miss Hawley, with a curious little gasp, half way between a sob and a laugh.

"Oh, dear!" sighed Mrs. Hawley, as the door closed behind her stepdaughter. "I don't believe I can stay in this room. I'm afraid Margaret only took me in because she thought people would talk if she didn't. I don't know but I should be happier in the poorhouse."

When Mrs. Hawley was eating her supper that night, she upset a cup of tea, and the hot liquid quickly spread itself over the marble-topped table and dripped down on the carpet. Then she dropped a piece of butter.

"Oh, how careless I am!" she faltered apologetically. "Everything will be spoiled."

"That's just what I expected when I let you into this room," said Miss Hawley in a hard voice.

"But, indeed, I don't want to spoil your things. And if I'd known that you planned to give me this room I wouldn't have come here. I'd rather be in the poorhouse."

"That's a grateful speech!" cried Miss Hawley tartly. "Finish your supper, mother. I can't wait here all night, and I can't run back and forth, either. I have to take a great many steps."

"You can take the things now, Margaret. I don't care for any more supper."

Miss Hawley took the tray and started for the door with unnecessary clatter.

"Good night, mother," she said shortly; "I shan't be in again till morning."

"Good-night," replied the old lady sadly. "O Lord, show me what to do," she prayed when she was alone.

A week went by. Miss Hawley continued grim and unrelenting. Mrs. Hawley spent much time in reading her Bible and in prayer. And at last she came to a decision.

"Margaret," she said one day, "I feel that I can't stay here any longer. I'm grateful to you for asking me here—'twas kind in you—but this room is too nice to be turned into a sleeping-room. The Lord will be with me wherever I am, and some way I don't dread the poorhouse as I did."

Miss Hawley's face was a study. Anger, pride, shame, were all struggling for the mastery; but her better nature triumphed.

"Mother, forgive me!" she cried. "I have been a wicked woman. This parlor has been a sort of idol to me—I see it now. And, indeed, I think I knew it all the time, but I wouldn't yield. The Lord doesn't want me to have any parlor—at least, until my heart is purified. O mother, forgive me, and I will try to make your life brighter." And then Miss Hawley did what was for her an unprecedented thing; she kissed her stepmother.

"My daughter," faltered the old lady tremulously, "May God bless you."

Giving Testimony*

GOOD teachers often remark that different pupils require different demonstrations of the same problem, before it can be understood by each one. The instructor's ingenuity is often taxed to the utmost in order to invent new phrases and varied processes for the illumination of his subject.

But there is one thing which all interpret alike; which requires no straining after fit words to express; which is plain and convincing to the dullest mind. It is the righteous and godly life. The man who, defying all temptation, lives honestly and purely, does not need to speak a word. You know what he believes.

One of our great preachers has dwelt pathetically upon the lack of imagination among men. They want a conception of God, but they cannot form it. Thousands of Christians echo the old complaint of Job: "Behold, I go forward, but he is not there; and backward, but I cannot perceive him; . . . how small a whisper do we hear of him."

They pray to a vast cloudiness—a nebulous vision in the sky. To such men, unable to maintain in their minds a strictly spiritual image of Christ, this great preacher commended the words which he taught to his apostles: "He that receiveth a righteous man in the name of a righteous man shall receive a righteous man's reward." For the literal mind, only a visible symbol will suffice. It must touch, see, feel, before it can believe; and the righteous man in the community becomes, often unconsciously, the representative of his great Master to such minds.

It was said by one who loved Phillips Brooks, "When I see that man, it is easy to believe in God."

Thousands, without knowing it, have their faith in the Saviour established by watching a godly man. The godly man has "that inward eye" which perceives the hidden things of the Spirit. Many who observe him, having it not, still dumbly feel his higher prescience, and by following his example they, too, find their way to heaven. Beware lest thou, having been singled out by some blind, wavering soul to stand in the place of that unseen God whom he cannot apprehend, shouldst lead astray that confiding, bewildered one. This thought should make us all very humble, very prayerful.

Dr. Banks tells a story of Edward VII., when as the Prince of Wales he visited this country. He was being entertained on a great Western ranch, and a fishing excursion was arranged for him on a certain day. A gruff old rancher had promised to provide the bait, but quite late on the evening before the anticipated sport, it had not come. The host sent for the rancher.

"We must have that bait before daylight, Mr. Pratt," he said sternly.

"You'll have it," said the old man. "Didn't Jabez give you his word?"

"But how do I know that he will keep it?"

"Because he is a Pratt. None of the Pratts was ever known to tell a lie."

He tramped off in hot wrath, while the host turned to the Duke of Newcastle, who was standing by, and begged him to excuse the old man's rudeness.

"I don't call him rude," declared the Duke. "Why shouldn't the Pratts be as proud of their honest blood as the Pelham-Clintons?" (This was the family name of the house of Newcastle.)

The man who follows the Master must have this sacred pride. He is a Christian. His Lord's honor — the honor of his whole family on earth—it is the part of every Christian to uphold. He is "an ensample." Let him not forget it.

Larger Work*

THE law of progress reigns in the moral and spiritual world just as in the physical. As the days go on, there is always change. Nothing remains precisely the same from one hour to another. If improvement does not take place, there is deterioration. As the earth whirls through space, and as the solar system itself is forever traveling onward, so, impelled by the same omnipotent hand, the soul of man speeds ever in one direction or another. It is God's will that the worlds move forward. It is his will that the soul should move forward; but in some inscrutable and mysterious way, he has left man free to accept or reject this dictum. A man may, if he so choose, move backward; and the records of time are full of the names of those who have so chosen.

You may say that the vast majority of the world's inhabitants through the ages have never received the light by which to choose. Concerning those innumerable multitudes, it does not behoove us to dogmatize. The judge of the whole earth will do right.

But to us to whom the Gospel has been given, the choice has also been given. How shall we decide? Shall we go backward or forward?

Let us not confound this great opportunity with that for achieving worldly honors. The man who has attained to the highest spiritual places may be very lowly in the world's estimation.

Have you a bad temper, and can you control it better than a year ago? Then you are making progress. Are you inclined to be stingy and penurious, and are you growing more generous? Are you lazy and growing industrious? Are you fond of pleasure and inclined to dissipation and the joys of sense—and yet are you restraining your propensities and ever placing your religion foremost? Are you addicted to any sin, and yet fighting and conquering it day by day? Then you are going forward and not backward. Even if you are beaten from time to time—yet if you are picking yourself up after each defeat and going onward, never surrendering utterly; then you are forging upward and the horizon is enlarging around you.

Thus Peter, though humbled and overcome by his pride, was able to turn again to his Lord, beseeching forgiveness. Thus, pardoned, he went forward, delivering his immortal pentecostal sermon, pricking the hearts of those who heard until they begged to be shown some great work to do; healing the sick; calling all to repentance; and receiving the high assurance of his victory, even that "the spirit of glory and of God" rested upon him; as he told his people of themselves.

Thus Stephen, "a man full of faith and of the Holy Ghost," whose face was as the face of an angel, though he was stoned for his faith, was able with his dying breath to rise to sublimest heights of love and forgiveness, murmuring, "Lord, lay not this sin to their charge."

Thus Paul also, struggling through "labors, stripes, prisons, deaths," was able to say, "I have all and abound," and to have a glorious faith that he would be "caught up in the clouds, to meet the Lord in the air," and so ever to be with the Lord. It is inevitable, if our faces be ever turned toward the Father, and if we persist, in spite of discouragements and failures, that we should rise step by step up Mount Zion.

And in this progress we must not fear to undertake great enterprises for our faith. Do not shrink back and say, "I cannot," when responsibilities are laid upon you. Do not fear to enlarge the scope of the work of your society. God will help.

Questions and Answers

R. E. B., Elm Grove, W. Va. What is the sin against the Holy Ghost?

It is believed to have been attributing the works of the Holy Spirit (miracles, etc.) to Satanic agency. Such is the view of some of the leading commentators.

J. McL., Hattiesburg, Miss. Why have not the tombs of Jacob and Joseph been opened by excavators? Both were embalmed in Egypt (says the Bible) and are no doubt in the same state of preservation as the Pharaohs.

The tombs of the patriarchs at the present time are under Mohammedan control, and are rigidly guarded against intrusion. To do what you suggest would doubtless be considered profanation. Privileged visitors to Hebron are permitted to view the exteriors of the tombs, but nothing more. Joseph was buried in Shechem.

J. L. E., Connecticut. Is the platter-shaped Japanese coin in the Philadelphia mint the largest coin in the world? 2. Are there more in the United States?

1. The Japanese consul in New York, to whom your question has been referred, thinks that it is. 2. Probably not, as that coin passed out of circulation when the Japanese ports were opened to foreigners.

G. L., Nanticoke, Pa. 1. What is meant by the passage which speaks of our Lord being made perfect through suffering (Heb. 2: 10). I always thought that Jesus Christ was free from any imperfection, and therefore did not need making perfect. 2. Was our Lord's body naturally immortal? In Rom. 8: 3, I read of our Lord being in the likeness of sinful flesh; and if so, was not his body like that of other human beings, liable to mortality? How could his death be voluntary?

1. The better and clearer rendering is "to perfect through suffering," to bring to a glorious consummation, through suffering as the appointed avenue. Some able scholars render it "to perfect a completed sacrifice." There is no suggestion of imperfection in the ordinary sense. 2. It is true, he was in the likeness of sinful flesh, being "in all things as we are, yet without sin"; but that the sacrifice of his life was a voluntary one, is evident from his own declaration in John 10: 18. Having taken up the great work of the world's redemption, he would carry it through to the end.

S. E. E., Grand View, Ia. Is there foodstuff in China that can be bought in China or at its ports?

At some of the southern Chinese ports there are foodstuffs, but the principal sources of supply, in times of shortage, have been Hong-Kong, Rangoon in Burma, and Singapore.

J. B. R., Decatur. In studying the Bible should we regard it as a unit—a single book—or as a number of independent books?

It is not a single book, but a series of books. The Old Testament, in the phraseology of Jerome, is a library. It is the accumulated sacred literature of the Jewish nation, and its present form is practically as it was when the canon of Hebrew Scripture was determined in Ezra's time. It includes poetic books, dramatic books, history, prophecy, oratory, biography, philosophy, law, theology. The New Testament may in a more accurate sense be regarded as a single book, embracing, in its various stages, the birth, life, mission, death and resurrection of the Saviour, the testimony of his immediate disciples, the organization of his church on earth, the rules of Christian conduct and discipline and the exposition and fulfilment of the prophecies concerning Christ. This silver cord of prophecy pointing to Jesus runs through both the Old Testament and New Testament, and thus the two sections make a complete whole.

M. V. B. P., Salem, Mass. A writer on "Word Studies" in reference to Matt. 26: 29, says: "'This fruit of the vine'—suggesting that water had been added to the wine; otherwise the words would have been, 'This fruit of the tree.'" Kindly explain how "tree" means or suggests pure wine, and "vine" impure or "watered" wine.

The distinction seems to be too finely drawn. The words were simply the repetition, in a form adapted to the cup, of the phraseology used in verse 16 which referred to the paschal lamb and the bread eaten with it. It was a part of the Passover ceremonial.

W. T. W., Washington, D. C. Regarding the days of creation as eons of time, in the first eon God divided the light from the darkness and called the light day and the darkness night. How could this be with no sun? Three long eons pass and then God made the sun, moon and stars. Must we believe this earth to be alone in the universe for millions of years and then be surrounded by myriads of suns with their probable planets? These questions have long perplexed me.

LEARN MUSIC AT HOME

Without Paying One Cent for Instruction

BY SPECIAL arrangement The Christian Herald is able to offer a Music Simplifier which will enable its readers to play the piano or organ without a teacher and without any outlay of money.

It consists of a series of simple lessons in music in the form of twenty-four charts bound in a book and showing a complete set of chords in all keys, both major and minor.

These charts are so simple that by placing them above the keys of the piano or organ you may begin to produce harmony from the keys at once, and in a short time, if you are willing to devote a reasonable amount of time to practice, you may confidently expect to play melodies.

Highest Authorities Approve This Method

This Music Simplifier has been approved by some of the highest musical authorities in the country, as shown by the testimonials printed below.

The course treats each key and its relative minor key in one lesson, making twelve lessons in all, comprising all of the different scales. The charts show a complete series of chords in all keys, and the method of using them is so simple and clear that the thorough learning of each lesson will, when the series is ended, give the student a good knowledge of the instrument.

The charts are marked with the forms of each key on the piano, and all that is necessary is to place each lesson directly above the keyboard of the instrument. Everything is then ready at your finger ends, and you will be surprised when you learn how easy it is to play.

So Simple Anybody May Learn

You do not, in the beginning, need to know one note or letter from another. As you are playing that feature is all the time before you. You soon learn the letters designating the notes, and you wonder how it all came to you so easily.

After the twelfth lesson your further advancement will depend upon your individual effort, but the foundation will have been laid, provided you have studied the lessons carefully. Of course, one cannot hope to master the art of playing without effort and much practice, but by following this method your energy is conserved, and unnecessary drudgery met with in other systems may be eliminated.

READ THESE TESTIMONIALS BY FAMOUS MUSICIANS:

JOSEF HOFMANN, the world renowned Pianist, says: "I consider the Music Simplifier a very useful improvement in piano-teaching."

DR. HORATIO W. PARKER, Theorist of Music, Yale University, New Haven, Conn., says: "This Music Simplifier seems to me an excellent adjunct to first lessons in the rudiments of music."

ord, makes it clear that all things came into being in their proper order. The Hebrew text might be read in substance thus: "Of old, in former duration, God created the heavens and the earth." The opening verse is regarded by the ablest scholars as a general preface, respecting the origin of all things, and then the narrative is confined almost exclusively to the earth. With regard to the anterior or subsequent creation of other worlds, this account has nothing to do, although their previous existence can be assumed from the narrative. In verse 3, the words "Let there be light" do not mean a creative act at that moment; but rather a command for the diffusion of light. The same remark applies to verse 7, "God made the firmament," which more accurately interpreted, would read "prepared" or "arranged" the firmament, implying that it was already existent, but that up to that stage, the atmosphere had not been completely purified, so that the heavenly bodies might appear.

S. M. Provence, Victoria, Texas, writes: "In the answer to the question concerning the supposed identity of Mary of Bethany and Mary "Magdalene," it should be stated that there is not the slightest foundation for the supposition that they were the same. There is no mention ever afterward of the outcast whom Jesus pardoned at a dinner early in his ministry. He immediately dismissed the woman with a warning, and she dropped out of the history. Her name was never given. Mary of Magdala (so-called as a convenient distinction from the other Marys) was named from the town of Magdala, where she lived. Upon her first appearance in the history she is mentioned along with other women of means and of social standing, and the fact is mentioned that she had been cured of an aggravated case of demoniacal possession. No stain ever attached itself to her name during her life. The wretched legend that grew up about Mary of Bethany was quite as groundless. The late Professor Plumtre, of King's College, London, discussed the subject fully in Smith's Bible Dictionary (American Edition, unabridged)."

J. C. G., Westgrove, Pa. Please explain Heb. 6: 4.

It means that it will be impossible for those who have fallen away after being enlightened—having had knowledge of the word of truth, and of the pesce that comes from the remission of sins, and of the "heavenly gift" (which in that age was usually combined with miraculous results)—again to renew to the full the same joy they first experienced, or to stand in the same holy relation to Christ in which they once stood. The apostle here warns the Hebrews that complete and wilful apostasy will not be forgiven.

P. H., Burnhams, N. Y. Please tell me from whom the Philistines were descended, and also the origin of the Gipsies.

The origin of the Philistines is nowhere expressly stated in the Bible; but since the prophets describe them as "the Philistines from Caphtor" (Amos 9: 7), and "the remnant of the maritime district of Caphtor" (Jer. 47: 4), it is probable that they were the "Caphtorim which came out of Caphtor," and who expelled the Avim from their lands and occupied them (Deut. 2: 23), and that they were the Caphtorim mentioned in the Mosaic genealogical table among the descendants of Mizraim. There is equal authority for believing Caphtor to have been the island of Cyprus, or a land somewhere between Egypt and Ethiopia, or a part of Northern Egypt. Some have claimed that Caphtor and the modern island of Crete are identical; but the best authorities do not agree with this conclusion. The Gipsies are a nomadic race, scattered all over the world, whose origin is unknown. It has been traced to several different sources by various scholars, and they have been called Egyptians, Huns, Bohemians and even the lost ten tribes of Israel. They call their language Romani, but it is probably derived from Sanskrit or an intermediate dialect. This language exists in several dialectic forms, but is as true and distinct a language as any in existence. It is now quite generally supposed that this odd people is of Indian or at least Eastern descent.

Miscellaneous

Mrs. S. E. S., Denver, Col. We know of no such agency.

T. S. W., Mount Ayr, Ia. Any one of the three in the Trinity may be addressed in prayer.

L. L., Reynoldsville, Pa. 1. In John 4: 1, 2, it is stated that "Jesus made and baptized more disciples than John, though he himself baptized not, but his disciples." It is inferred that his own immediate disciples must have been admitted into the company by baptism. Andrew seems to have been baptized by John the Baptist (see John 1: 35, 37, 40). Jesus himself, as some infer, may have baptized some of his earlier disciples, who were then authorized to baptize the others. 2. Those who become leaders in the Lord's work should cultivate audible as well as secret prayers, the former for the purpose of directing others in devotion.

SOME MEN OF THE HOUR IN MEXICO

By CHARLES M. PEPPER

MEXICO in the crises through which it is passing is going through two tests. One is of the mass of the people. The other is of the public men who are expected to solve the situation.

Most of the Mexican people are kindly enough and well disposed. There are something like fifteen million of them, and with the larger part the Indian blood with the Spanish admixture predominates. They are wofully ignorant compared with the people of our own country, but that is in no way a measure of their capacity for better things. Much has been done for them since General Diaz more than a quarter of a century ago by his iron rule established order and gave protection to peaceful industry. More may be done under the new dispensation, but it will be on the foundation built by President Diaz and the men who have been identified with his rule.

A very brilliant Mexican, Señor Pablo Macedo, in an address some years ago declared that it was impossible for a people to be free where schools do not exist. Schools do exist in Mexico, and a fairly good educational system has been established; but when it is broadened and improved the mass of the people will be in a better position to learn the principles of free government and the self-restraint which distinguishes liberty from license.

While there will be improvement in the schools the lack of educational facilities is not, after all, the cause of the revolutionary movements. There are in fact many causes, some of them of an economic character and some of them of a political nature. Economic reforms will come first, and among these without doubt will be some measures for breaking up the enormous estates, hundreds of miles in extent, which are held by a few individuals. A few years ago a very distinguished Mexican, then holding a diplomatic position, asked me on my return from a visit to Mexico what I thought the most serious drawback to future progress. I unhesitatingly replied, "Land monopoly." "Yes," he said, "that subject has given us much concern. We must find a way to give the people land."

This Mexican was one of a group of influential leaders with whom I had been associated during the Pan-American Conference at Mexico City in 1902. He was a member of what was known as the scientific and literary group. At that time all were very friendly to General Diaz, although they differed a good deal among themselves; but every one of them had the welfare of Mexico at heart and was studying deeply the measures which would benefit the mass of the people. Señor de la Barra, who after a brilliant diplomatic career was called home to become Minister of Foreign Affairs in the crisis, was one of this group. The majority of them were at that time young men, or men who had not reached middle age. So most of them are still in the meridian of life. All of them are devoted to the independence of Mexico, which was wrested from Spain under the patriot priest Hidalgo and was maintained against European aggression by Juarez.

At the time of the Pan-American Conference there were also some very influential men who were not identified with the literary and scientific group. One of these was General Bernardo Reyes, who was recently summoned from Paris to take part in the rehabilitation of his country. General Reyes was at that time Minister of War. His career had been full of the romance of patriotism. As a boy of sixteen, he had run away from home and become a soldier in the army of patriots which was fighting the French army that Napoleon III. had sent to Mexico to impose monarchical government on the country and keep Maximilian on the throne, as was desired by the clerical party.

Young Reyes was wounded several times and was conspicuous for his personal bravery. At twenty-six he was a colonel. His military talents gave him various commands, and after the French were driven out he fought the organized bandits and helped to put down revolutions against the government. As military commander he settled an election dispute in the State of Coahuila which threatened to result in a revolution because there were two candidates, each of whom announced that if he were not made Governor, his followers would fight. General Reyes marched his troops into the State capitol, called the defiant leaders together and told them they must compromise on a third man. The two candidates did a great deal of talking, but in the end both withdrew, a compromise was made, and peace prevailed in Coahuila.

General Bernardo Reyes

President Diaz showed his appreciation of General Reyes from time to time until the latter became Secretary of War after having been Governor of the State of Nuevo Leon. Then a break came because it was claimed General Reyes had ambition to be President himself. He retired from the cabinet and returned to Nuevo Leon as Governor. There was coolness between the President and the Governor of Nuevo Leon, but General Reyes continued to discharge his civil duties. He was Governor, my recollection is, when the great flood occurred at Monterey which was succored by gifts of money, blankets and food from CHRISTIAN HERALD readers.

The friction with the administration of President Diaz continued, and the outcome was that General Reyes accepted a military mission to Europe and withdrew from Mexico. He was in Paris when the summons came to return. Much is to be hoped from the exercise of his abilities and from his deep patriotism.

A SERMON BY

Rev. Frederick F. Shannon, D.D.*

The Splendor-Slain

TEXT: Rev. 1:17—"And when I saw him, I fell at his feet as dead."

IT IS the confession of a splendor-slain soul. A banished, lonely man stands on a solitary, sea-washed isle. But he is true brother to all "in the tribulation and kingdom and patience which are in Jesus." Thus his physical loneliness is forgotten in the spacious, universal, social consciousness. Fellowship with the eternal—the eternal in man and the eternal in God; love for the Highest, which he has seen garbed in warm-blooded human flesh; in a word, brotherhood and vision have made the Patmos Seer exquisitely sensitive to the melodies and glories of another world. So, Patmos is now neither bleak nor lonely. It is an enchanted island—a splendid jewel set in an ethereal sea—and the whole universe seems intent on stopping at its golden shores.

Why, the white societies of the heavenlies have come to visit John on his sea-girt isle. The martyrs, having put off their blood-dyed garments for robes of pure white, are there. The redeemed, loosed from their sins by the blood of the Lamb, are there. The old, old harpers from before the dawn of time, are there. The snow-clad angels, with woven lightnings for wings and ocean-thundered waves for voices, are there. Heaven's rainbowed throne, flashing in emerald brilliance, and occupied by One "to look upon like a jasper stone and a sardius," is there. Streams of radiance pour down the sides of the universe and meet in one vast, limitless, molten sea of glory.

The White Thought of Christ

Now, John was able to endure the sight of all—save One. He beheld the redeemed, the harpers, the angels, the martyrs with unblinded eyes. But when he saw the faithful Witness, the First-born of the dead, the Ruler of the kings of the earth, the Golden-girdled, the snow-white head, the fire-flaming eyes, the brass-burnished feet, the many-watered voice, the seven-starred hand, the swordlike mouth, the sun-flashing countenance of the eternal Christ, John exclaims: "When I saw him, I fell at his feet as one dead!"

My subject, then, is "The Splendor-Slain." Let us but have a true vision of our Lord. Then we, too, may be numbered among the royal company of those who fall dead at his feet, only to be lifted by his strong, tender, fearless hands to a height beyond all heights.

Think, first, of the splendor of Christ's white thought. "And his head and his hair were white as white wool, white as snow." Thought, like the rainbow, has many colors. There is philosophic thought, scientific thought, psychologic thought, biographic thought. The great minds have been able to gather one, two, sometimes three, rarely, indeed, four of these thought-colors, making them serviceable to mankind. But as the white reflects all the rays of the spectrum combined, so the splendor of Christ's thought gathers all scattered mental rays into one pearl lustre. Then, with a consciousness deeper than the sea, higher than the stars, wider than the world, longer than the ages, he says calmly, but irresistibly: "I am the truth."

Great Thoughts of Humanity

Christ is the truth about life's ultimate, final things. One word of his empties a tide of meaning upon all life—"as mine-lamps enkindled a hidden gem." Great, indeed, is our debt to the imperial thinkers. Plato waved his thought-wand, and ideal republics arose in its magic wake. Aristotle was called nature's private secretary. For two centuries his works lay buried amid the rubbish of an old cellar. But thought refuses to be entombed, and at last—a kind of third day in the intellectual kingdom—the immortal Greek rose again from the dark and the damp. What a mind Moses must have had to have recorded the Ten Words of the old law! Inspired by God Moses unquestionably was. But is it not something regal, something unique, to have possessed a brain capable of catching the thought-waves, engraving the breath of the Almighty upon its delicate tablets? Michael Angelo carried Saint Peter's tucked away in his brain-cells long, long before the magnificent cathedral soared up to the sky in its clothing of stone and marble, its interior studded with gold and precious gems. Voltaire is responsible for the story that the apple, in falling, struck Newton's head. This ancient object of Eve's undoing hit Newton so hard and made him so angry that he forthwith determined to find out what made that apple fall. O precious, luscious, golden fruit! It must have fallen from the Tree of Life which blooms in the Garden of God! For, in questing his way through the realms of thought, Newton discovered the law of gravity and taught men that

> The world was built in order,
> And the atoms march in tune.

So we give thanks for these, and all true, great thinkers, living and dead. They have done their best, they have done well, they have done all that men could do. And they are nothing less than beams raying forth the Light of Life. Yonder sun shoots out myriad millions of rays. No insect, no leaf, no flower, no sprig of grass, no buried root, no thrilling bird, no beast, no human but may claim its beam. Yet is it not good to know that back of countless silver beams there is one central sun; that behind every ounce of energy, every blush of beauty, every throb of life, in our world and all the worlds of our solar system, stands that unifying, exhaustless fountain of heat and fire named the sun? So the Sun of Righteousness shines in the realm of pure thought. His is the sun-mind, and all other thinkers are thought-beams. True, the beams have too often forgotten their source. In their brief, winged brilliance they have scandalously denied their parent sun. But the Sun still floods their minds with light as he keeps on his untroubled way through the heavens of thought. "There was the true light, even the light which lighteth every man coming into the world."

> Light is light which radiates,
> Blood is blood which circulates,
> (Thought is thought which permeates),
> Life is life which generates,
> And many-seeming life is one.

Christ Supreme in Thought

He, and he alone, hath worn God's spotless thought-splendor through these aching human years. Once, and once only, in the history of our kind, has thought's many-colored beams melted into "the supersolar blaze." Once, and once only, has a snow-white head domed a brain that passed its thinking into the crystal radiance of perfect truth. Life, death, character, joy, sorrow, sin, salvation, destiny, heaven—in all this higher mental pioneering, Christ is solitary, unapproachable, absolutely supreme! Therefore, not to Plato, nor Aristotle, nor Moses, nor Angelo, nor Newton, nor to any of their kingly brethren, though the highest, holiest thinkers of the race, do we bow as we kiss the hem of thought's seamless garment. No! We look upon him who was pierced, the enthroned Thinker of the universe. We behold his head and his hair, white as white wool, white as snow. Then do we fall at his feet as one dead, stilled in the depth of his fathomless thought, grateful, loving brothers in the goodly company of the splendor-slain!

Think, also, of the splendor of Christ's burning vision. "And his eyes were as a flame of fire." Heaven's measure of a man is vision power. When intellect reaches its highest, it invariably breaks into the flame of vision. There are atmospheres of being so warm that in them the cold feet of intellect melt like wax in the July sun. Then doth the seraph of vision catch up the fainting soul and guide it on through the pilgrim realms of spirit. In vision hour, we see "the truths that never can be proved." Thus, it is no mere paradox to say that the intellectually unproved may be the spiritually ascertained. Of course, no visionless mind has ever been, or can be, a harmonious mind—a mind in which all the powers act concertedly and completely. Now, it is because of the perfectly harmonious working of Christ's mental faculties, unclogged by the dirt of sin, unstained by the red of guilt, unchilled by the blasts of impurity, that the light of clear-splendored vision shone so luminously in "His eyes, which were as a flame of fire."

Not by way of comparison—for comparisons are never so odious as setting men alongside the Christ—but for the sake of appreciating His own infinite superiority, let us think, for a moment, of the lords of vision. Blind old Homer was the nightingale that warbled through the long nights of history's vanished dawns. Blind he was and poor, but Homer's dead eyes blazed with an inner, diamond light—the light of vision. What Homer was to Greece, Vergil was to Italy. But let us not forget that the Aeneid waited for fifteen long centuries for a publisher. It is indeed touching and sublime to see Tennyson, in his old age, wrapped in his softly murmuring, singing robes, going back, as in his boyhood, to the sweet, fresh song-fountains of Vergil, in whom "all the charms of all the Muses often flowered in a lonely word." Vergil's songs are at times so fine and high as to burst into rosy, golden vision. At a later time, Dante, by the light of vision, digged new cellars under hell and trod new floors over heaven. Perhaps the mind of Raphael housed the most nimble, the most ideally beautiful imagination ever given to mortal man. He Hellenized the Hebraic universe, replacing those stern old personages with ideal figures which thrill with "love's loveliest rapture."

The Vision of Christ

And yet, compared with Christ's vision power, even the lords and kings of vision in every sphere are pathetically poor. Hugo said that Shakespeare's rhythm is so vast that it staggers. But Christ's rhythm is so vast, and so steady, clean and high in its vastness, that it walks straight on to the last marge of the world, and then unwearedly climbs the sacred, happy hills of God. The best the lords of vision can do is to set their toy boats asail upon a painted ocean. But the Lord of the years and the spheres, the Pilot of heaven's deeps, puts his white eternal ships of vision out on the tumbling oceans of reality, and they all come sailing home at last to drop anchor in love's crystal seas. Too often, alas! the seers behold only phantasmal dreams. But Christ is the Master imperial and universal—the artist in white flesh and red blood, the transformer of matter-clogged spirit into high and glorious human character. What vision that could ensphere the ages: "And I say unto you, That many shall come from the east and west, and shall sit down with Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob, in the kingdom of heaven!"

Consider, moreover, the splendor of Christ's perfect service. "And his feet like unto burnished brass, as if it had been refined in a furnace." Why, his holy feet walked the pathway of human and divine service so gloriously as to leave a brass-burnished refinement glowing upon all spheres of service. Are you a pilgrim toiler on the road of sorrow, poverty, heartache, defeat, ingratitude, sin? Then, hear me, my friends: your roads intersect at the crossways which meet in the large place of God's heart, opened wide by him who came not to be ministered unto, but to minister. Verily, Christ's service is the key, the interpretation to the service rendered by the universe itself. An old psalmist sang: "All things are thy servants." Thus, every object in the universe is a letter in the alphabet of service. Stars and suns, oceans and rivers, mountains and plains, trees and flowers, atoms and electrons, birds and beasts, men and women—all are servants, bound by gold chains about the feet of God.

The Symphony of Service

But oh, how shadowy, how meaningless, how tongueless they were for millions of ages! Then, in the fullness of time, Christ came and gave these silent letters voice, pronouncing the word service in tones of flesh and blood, until they echoed around the world and thundered on and up behind the towering hills of stars! Henceforth nations and planets shall beat time to the ageless, spheric symphony of service played out, amid tears and blood and triumph and immortal glory, by the Lamb that was slain from before the foundation of the world, by the Conqueror from Edom with crimsoned garments from Bozra, glorious in his apparel, marching in the greatness of his strength down "the ringing grooves of change," until he brings a white-robed humanity winging, singing home at last!

Christ has forever vitalized the idea of service by revealing that nothing is foreign to God which is essential to man. He only chops off the rotton bark t the living blooms may put forth the ever-growing human tree. And is the very simplicity of his concep-n which almost smites us blind by sky-born beauty. Professor Peady reminds us that "the prophets estled with the waves of social agi-ion; Jesus walked upon them. The ference was not so much one of sol intention as of social horizon. The rk of a reformer is for his own age; at of a revealer for all ages." Let then, have something of the maj-

y and sweep of our Revealer's hori-
n. Carlyle used to tell of an experice he had at Weimar. In a garden staurant, seated under a May-tree in ll bloom, he saw Schiller and Goethe inking coffee together. Slipping a aler into the waiter's hand, Carlyle as allowed to put on a white apron d wait upon those two kingdom-aking men. What fun and honor e great Scotchman must have had!
at you and I, my brethren, treading
e brass-burnished path of service azed out by our Master, not waiting on Goethes and Schillers, it may be, t serving Christ's little ones, shall ve a joy that swells the souls of ints, a peace that snows softly down om the robes of angels, as we take r place in the high society of the lendor-slain!

Consider, finally, the splendor of rist's many-toned authority. "And s voice as the sound of many waters." is a noble metaphor, surely, and andly suggestive of our sober, glo-ous, Christian truth. Roll the vol-ne of a thousand Niagaras into one rmonious tune of liquid thunder, en let every ripple in their foamhite, dashing, crashing, falling wars be touched into a rainbow, and ature will paint you a picture of the ean-like power and manifold diver-ty of Christ's authority. Why, his thority is in all, over all, and above
l. He is the one God, the one Man, r souls can afford to follow through e ever-widening kingdoms of the iritual.

How we need to enthrone his author-y in every walk of life to-day! When n earth, he did not "lute and flute ntastic tenderness." How firm, how rong, how sovereign the manhood at looked and lived and breathed rough him! With more than womnly tenderness, he yet incarnated a ugged masculinity that sent ancient ods of wrong, though fair as classic ngels, toppling and shivering down rom their stained pedestals. He azed upon distress with eyes all sumer; but upon petrified hyprocrisy he urned a wintry, killing glance that roze with icelike gloom and doom. His and was velveted with tenderness to ipe away the publican's tears; but it as gloved with steel to smite the harisee's self-righteousness. Against ll forms of injustice his indignation urned at white heat, as when billows f crackling flame roll across the wind-wept plains. Nor was he orbed in nreal isolation—he was heaven's big-earted, morning-souled warrior that ode at the head of the human battle.
hus, the light of his full-orbed nature trikes upon the immortal soul like lawn upon the hills of earth. Gnarled eep in his oaken truth are "the wrest-ing thews that throw the world."
When we obey him—

hen comes the statelier Eden back to men;
hen reigns the world's great bridal, chaste and calm;
hen springs the crowning race of humankind.

Let us, then, like John, join the shin-ng ranks of the splendor-slain, hear-ng him say: "Fear not; I am the first nd the last, and the Living One; and was dead, and behold, I am alive for vermore." Then shall we answer:
'O Love! how red thy heart is, and hy hands are full of roses!"

One Man in a Million

By EUGENE THWING

GREAT movements for the reform of national or social evils often lag and fail of success even when public sentiment is well-nigh unanimous in their favor. Work for the uplift of humanity, for the betterment of civic conditions, for the advancement of righteousness in business and public life makes too slow progress in spite of much preaching and praying. Why?

We are surely agreed concerning many things that ought to be done. World peace is something we all long for; honesty in legislation and in the administration of city, State, and national affairs is a condition we all desire, earnestly, though almost without hope. Justice, peace, and cooperation between capital and labor seem to all of us so needful and so sure to result in good for both sides that we wonder they seem at the same time so impossible to attain. Emancipation of the men and the homes of this country from the liquor traffic is a vital, imperative thing, but still far from achievement; and the gain in one place seems almost to be offset by the loss in another. Why do these and other great needs of humanity and of the State cry out so long unsatisfied?

SOMEWHERE, at this moment, one man or one woman is quietly reading these words. The answer to the question must be found, in part, with him or with her. Never mind how many men and women may be reading this page, the question must be answered, if at all, by one—definitely, positively, finally.

A mighty engine drives an ocean liner across the deep, or causes a heavy train to go rushing over three thousand miles of track. It never would have moved an inch if the propelling force had not begun with a single ounce of steam in the boiler. If every drop of water had remained cold, waiting for every other drop to turn to steam first and do the work, there never would have been power in that boiler.

Power in a multitude of citizens must begin with the individual initiative and action of one citizen. There is no habit and no hope of original action in the multitude. That is why needs universally recognized often are not met; reforms widely desired are not brought to pass. Everybody waits for everybody else, and the multitude does not act.

A million men and women may earnestly believe in and long for a thing, but it will never be gained until one man in the million makes up his mind that he is going to devote time and strength to get that thing whether any one else does so or not.

We have too much the habit of considering the great works of righteousness and humanity from a point of observation rather than from a point of contact and a place of active personal participation.

Martin Luther was the one man in a million in the cause of religious freedom. The history of religious advancement, of science, of art, of education, of government, has been made, not by the multitude which has followed, but by the individuals of initiative, creative force and determination who have led.

WE ADMIRE our great men and set them on a pedestal for the crowd to behold; but why keep them apart as a race of giants by themselves? Why not reach out and take them by the hand, as it were, and claim brotherhood? There are giant deeds in this country to-day waiting for the "one man in a million." He need not stop to remark that every other man in the million may do the same as he. It is true; but he must not wait for them. In his own relationship to the work and to his God who gave him the power to do his share, he is the one man, and the only man, whose responsibility and opportunity concern him.

"Give me a standing-place, and I will move the world," said Archimedes. "Give me a chance; give me money; give me influence with the government; give me this, that, or the other thing," says many a man to-day, "and I will put a stop to this wrong, or establish that right; I will move the world." Goethe changed the postulate of Archimedes into a precept—a ringing challenge: "Make good thy standing-place, and move the world!" With your heart full of a passion for service, and your arteries charged with good red blood for action, go forth, bold and courageous, into a fight that will cost time and strength and sacrifice. Do not expect to accomplish anything worth while without paying the price; but what is life good for without its real adventures in unselfish service for the common weal? It may be that your adventures, solitary at first, will bring you great joy in accomplishment, and the acclaim of the multitude whose welfare you advance. In any event you may be sure of that word at the end which will be the most precious of all rewards, "Well done, good and faithful servant; enter thou into the joy of thy Lord."

Watched It Grow with the Years

I cannot now write a good hand, for I have arrived at an age when the keepers of the house tremble, and it is time, for I am about seventy. I like your paper much, and you are doing a great work. I remember your first issue—a little seven by nine paper, filled to the brim with good reading—and I frequently bought a copy. Little did I think then that in time it would grow and become in after years a great power for good. I hope that the paper and its influence for good will continue to grow until its influence becomes world-wide.

A Cordial Letter from Texas

I am sending in my renewal. I did not intend to neglect this so long. I cannot think of doing without THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. There are so many things in it that are helpful to me. I am only a Sunday School teacher down here in the "Lone Star" State, but I love to read the Sunday School lessons and "Young People's Societies." "Comfort Corner" is helpful as I am the mother of five girls and one boy, ranging from one and a half years to fourteen. I say, God bless the Children's Home, Dr. Klopsch's most beloved work.

CAPTAIN ABNER'S OPINION

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER

GIVE me the Bible, Jennie, the good old Book for me;
The one I've loved and leaned upon in storms on land and sea.
It's been a pillow for my head in many a sleepless night,
It's been a heaven-guiding star to give me cheer and light.
Don't bring that new revision, I'm not in need of change,
The music is not quite the same if chord and key are strange.
I like the dear old-fashioned words I learned at mother's knee,
Bring me the Bible, Jennie, the good old Book for me.

Our parson in the pulpit explains the meanings well;
To him the slightly altered phrase is like a silver bell.
To me a change is out of tune; it does not sound so sweet.
You ken I'm watching daily for the Master's coming feet.
I'm listening should He call me, I long His knock to hear;
If for me He has a message, I want it plain and clear.
I'm not a scholar, Jennie, I'm only what you see,
And the Bible I have always had is the best of books for me.

I sailed the ocean, Jennie, when I was but a lad;
Sea-faring men get close to God when tempests rave like mad.
In the darkness of wild weather the sky was overcast,
But I trod the deck in safety and came to port at last.
When the Master was on earth, dear, He seemed to like the sea,
And once He hushed a driving storm on the Lake of Galilee;
When I was but a little chap I mind I used to look
At a picture mother had of Him, 'twas in her dear old Book.

At the wedding and the funeral, whene'er the heart is full,
It craves the thing it understands, old memories tug and pull.
To just an average man like me there comes a sense of loss,
A feeling that a hand profane might touch the Crown and Cross;
That from the East the Star might fade, the Manger disappear,
The Virgin Mother and the Child grow dimmer year by year,
If one by one the miracles were all explained away
In the scientific brightness of our glaring modern day.

What I'm afraid of, Jennie, is the tiny entering wedge;
The field is bare to every one if a gap be in the hedge.
I like my Bible as it is, a well of water sweet,
Where thirsty souls may rest themselves, and drink, in sun and heat.
The minister may need it, but we common folk can wait
To find our new revision when we reach the pearly gate.
I want it as it is, my dear, its pith and poetry;
Bring me my Bible, Jennie, the good old Book for me.

THE ORIGIN OF "PEACE DAY"

TWELVE years ago, on the afternoon of May 18, a group of one hundred men from twenty-two nations gathered in the Orange Hall of Queen Wilhelmina's little palace, "The House in the Woods," at The Hague. It was a skeptical and uninspired group. In response to the rescript of the Czar of Russia, which had fallen amongst the startled nations like a bolt from the blue, these statesmen had come, bringing cynicism or indifference, and expecting nothing more than some slight perfunctory action. They had counted without some of their number, however; for amongst those skeptics were two men whose larger vision could see beyond the horizon to a warless future when, as Tennyson said,

The war-drum throbbed no longer, and the battle flags were furled
In the Parliament of man, the Federation of the world.

These men were Julian, Lord Pauncefote, Great Britain's ambassador at Washington, and Andrew D. White, the United States minister to Berlin. With a few supporters these men threw into all the work of the conference their optimism and energy. Innumerable social functions brought the strangers together and established that basis of good will which made possible the results which were finally accomplished. The greatest of these was the declaration of "war against war" by the establishment of The Hague Permanent Tribunal of Arbitration, for the housing of which Andrew Carnegie is providing a building at a cost of a million and a half dollars.

Many nations have already availed themselves of this International Court. Here Great Britain and Russia peaceably settled the differences that arose from the Russian fleet's firing upon English fishing craft off the Dogger Banks in the North Sea. A provision of that conference made it possible for Theodore Roosevelt to call the representatives of Russia and Japan to that meeting at Kittery Navy Yard whose outcome was the treaty that ended our most bloody modern war.

"The House in the Woods," Where the First Peace Conference Was Held

The second Hague Conference has been held, in the meantime, and still further steps toward world-wide organization were made. All the indications point to the realization of the great laureate's prophetic vision in these conferences. It is not now an impossible step to the enforcement of the decisions of the Hague Tribunal by an International Executive Commission, and all the world has risen to acclaim the proposal of Sir Edward Grey that the rival armies and navies of the world shall become its police force for the regulation of its commerce and the enforcement of law and order.

The United States and the British Empire are looking forward to the celebration of the completion of a century of peace between them; and if the wisdom of President Taft, Sir Edward Grey and Sir Thomas Vesey Strong, the Lord Mayor of London, can but prevail, that celebration will serve to mark the opening of that era in which, as we are one in language and descent, we shall be one in aim—the preventi of the crime of war.

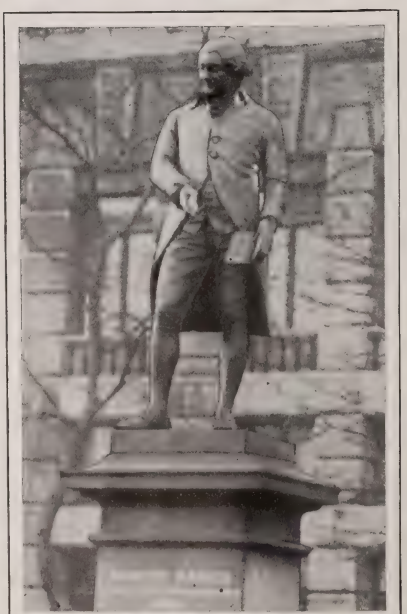
This is the age of the power of ganization. Men have learned to operate; and in all the activities of lives the might of this rapidly devel ing force is making itself manife In the business of the governments the world, in the handling of the v business interests of our nation, agriculture, in manufacture, and, b of all, in the advancement of the ca of righteousness and truth throughc the world, co-operation is the new, conquering slogan.

We are living in one of the great m ments of history, when God flash forth his mind and makes his purpc clear. A "war against war" is t most inspiring battle cry the world h ever heard. After two thousand yea the angels' song of "peace on ear good will to men," has become the pea cry of the thinking world. The s uation should be met and handl squarely.

All who desire the uplift of huma ity, the onward march of the hum race to larger, higher destinies, shou think it their unquestioned duty to volunteers and contribute their quo of personal effort toward the divi edict, "Live peacefully one with a other." The situation should be m largely with personal interest.

The founders of the World Pea Foundation declare that success li less in conventions and publicatio than along the avenues of educatic and in the effort of teachers and mi isters, and fathers and mothers.

"Jerusalem was destroyed becau the children's hearts were never firec is an old saying of the Talmud; but such accusation could be broug against the United States of Americ The hope and pride of America h ever been the little red schoolhou But what of to-morrow? Better ci zens—better men and women—this the cry of America to her childre only through education to the gospel "peace on earth, toward men of go will" shall we attain our petition, "T kingdom come, thy will be done earth as it is in heaven."



Robert Raikes: The Founder of Sunday Schools

THE recent world-wide commemoration of the centenary of the death of Robert Raikes has united Sunday School scholars and teachers all over the globe. They have combined to honor a great name, which is in no danger of ever passing into oblivion. The son of a printer who had successfully founded the Gloucester Journal, Robert Raikes was born at Gloucester, England, on September 14, 1735, and on his father's death succeeded him in the management of the Journal and the printing business attached to it.

During the early Georgian era no provision for the moral welfare of the children of the poor was made, beyond the extreme severity of the penal laws, which were supposed to be sufficient agents for the extinction of violence and crime. Upon this dark moral outlook the compassionate heart of Robert Raikes gazed with extreme sympathy. The condition of the children oppressed him, while his observation led him, even before the advent of John Howard, to mark the abuses of the prevailing prison system, with its troops of juvenile offenders. The neglect of any spiritual training for the outcast children stirred him into action. He opened his first Sunday School in July, 1780, and, after the early struggles, its success was tremendous.

Sunday Schools in imitation of his rose all over England; within the short space of six years it was estimated that two hundred thousand children were being drawn from the darkest ignorance and neglect. At Christmas, 1787, the disinterested love of Raikes for his fellow-creatures reached the royal ears, and he was summoned to Queen Charlotte's presence and assured of the royal support in his future undertakings.

The Sunday School Union, the development of these private efforts, was founded in 1803, and its first teachers received a salary, an arrangement long since swept away by devoted gratuitous service all over the world. Robert Raikes, who had retired from business in 1802, and lived on a pension from the Gloucester Journal, continued his ceasele efforts for the instruction of the poor until the ye 1811, when, on April 5, he died, and was buried the Church of St. Mary le Crypt, in London, En land.

The White Rose Trail

SHE was getting old and feeble, and her hair w silver gray;
She had rocked the old red cradle many times younger day.
For her children well she builded; some had earn both fame and name;
But the grand Fifth Avenue mansion and the cotta weren't the same.

In the cottage near the hillside she had lived her li indeed;
In the brown soil of her garden she could plant t homely seed.
Now she views the old sun-bonnet with a tired a homesick air,
For John says she "mustn't wear it"; he's a mode millionaire.

But one morn she left the mansion; ere the sho day reached its close
She was sleeping in the cottage, and a single swe white rose
In that chamber had expanded. Mother's gone, a now John knows
That God plucked a star and laid it in the whi heart of the rose.

THE WRECK AT MARTIN'S CREEK

A TRAGIC end overtook a light-hearted excursion party which started from Utica, Syracuse and Waterville, N. Y., for Washington on April 29 when a special train carrying one hundred and sixty-nine school teachers and their friends and relatives was derailed and dashed down a forty-foot embankment at Martin's Ferry, N. J. The train left Utica on the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad, and when it reached Stroudsburg, Pa., a Pennsylvania Railroad crew took charge of it and was to have run it through to Philadelphia. It was traveling at fifty miles an hour when at 2.45 o'clock, in taking a curve where men had been repairing the tracks, there was a sudden jar and the excursionists in each car were thrown together in a heap. The locomotive jumped the track, carrying four cars with it.

Hardly had the train come to a stop at the foot of the embankment before fire started and spread so rapidly that some of the imprisoned passengers were burned to death. As the train left the track it side-swiped and broke a tank of oil which ran over the wreckage and added to the fury of the flames. The fire started at both ends of the train, hot coals from the fire-box of the engine starting the fire at that end and flames from the stoves in the dining car starting the destruction at the rear.

Men and women who were on the train say the scene that followed the accident is beyond their powers of description. Willing hands began the work of rescue as soon as they were able, and had it not been for the heroic efforts of the men and women, some of whom were cut and bleeding from their own wounds, the loss of life would have been appalling. Unconscious forms were pinioned beneath the wreckage with the flames leaping toward them, when the less seriously injured, at great risk to their own lives, plunged into the débris, worked the unconscious victims loose, and carried them beyond reach of the flames.

House Which Was Turned into a Hospital at the Scene of the Wreck

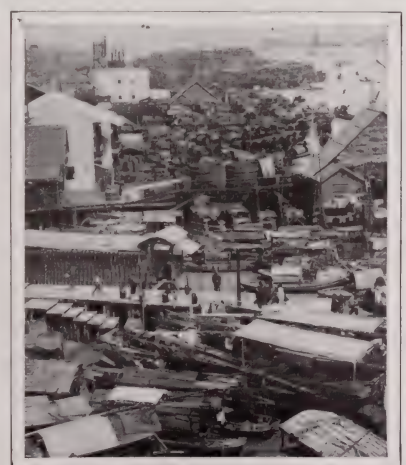
Wrecking Crews at Work Removing the Debris at Martin's Creek

Doctors were called from Easton, Pa., and every town within a radius of ten miles, and twenty minutes after the accident there were a score of physicians on the ground. They did everything possible to relieve the injured, and made them ready for the trip to the Easton Hospital. Every farmhouse in the vicinity was quickly transformed into an improvised hospital, and farmers' wagons were pressed into service as ambulances. Many of the injured remained at the farm houses where they were first sheltered and at Martin's Creek Hotel.

When the more seriously injured reached Easton, ambulances and motor cars were on hand to get them to the hospital with all possible speed. The sisters and nurses at the institution had prepared for their coming, and as soon as they arrived made them as comfortable as possible.

Eleven persons lost their lives, and it is believed that three or four others are fatally injured as the result of this terrible wreck. Many of those who worked so heroically in the rescue of their comrades were themselves badly cut and burned. Those who first reached the unfortunate ones have been highly commended by the doctors and by the friends and relatives of the injured. The physicians have stated that had it not been for the ministrations of Miss Anna Souders and Mr. and Mrs. David Hillyard many of the injuries would have been much worse.

AN ANTI-DYNASTIC REVOLT IN CHINA



DISCONTENT with the present ruling dynasty in China took concrete form in open revolt on April 30. There has been a gathering at Canton lately of those opposed to the Manchu dynasty. A few days ago several hundred arrived from Hongkong. The plot to overturn the government was betrayed, and the leaders of the movement urged the viceroy's bodyguard to join forces and kill the Manchus. This the bodyguard refused to do, with the result that when the attack was made upon the official residence of the viceroy the revolutionists were routed. Later, however, they returned to the attack, and succeeded in burning the vice-regal palace and compelling the viceroy to take refuge on a gunboat.

Wu Sum, a Chinese who was educated in Japan and has adopted the dress of Western countries, is the leader of the revolt against the Manchu dynasty. The brigand chief Luk of Shuntak is at the head of a horde of outlaws whose object is robbery, accomplished by killing. Following the standards of these two men are anarchist groups, to whose purpose the outbreak lends itself most advantageously. Rebellion, brigandage, and anarchy are stalking through the western half of Kwang-Tung Province, and the rebels are murdering, pillaging, and burning. Loyal troops are fighting desperately to crush the uprising, the seriousness of which was not at first fully realized.

The insurrection which began at Canton spread rapidly through the countryside. Under pressure of the loyal troops the rebels were compelled to withdraw to a great extent from Canton, and have devastated the country to the west along the West River. Before falling back they fought the troops from street to street, many persons being killed. They attacked the provincial arsenal and, being repulsed, gathered in an immense rice store, which they barricaded with bags of rice. From the building they threw bombs into the attacking troops and were only dislodged when the building was set on fire. Many of the rebels escaped, but thirty or more died in the flames, while others killed themselves to avoid capture. While the fighting was progressing in the streets Chinese gunboats patrolling the West River fired into several parties of rebels, slaughtering 200 of them. Retreating to the countryside, the revolutionaries attacked and captured Sam-Shui, thirty miles west of Canton, and murdered the prefect. The troops were put to flight and the rebels moved on to Wen-Chow and Woo-Chow, both of which towns they took after slight resistance. Luk's brigands, following in their wake, looted the shops of the three towns. One hundred revolutionaries attacked Fat-Shan on Sunday and succeeded in burning part of the town before they were repulsed.

British and German warships which were nearest to the seat of the insurrection were immediately hurried up the Canton River to give protection to the missionaries and other foreigners who were reported to be in grave danger. As soon as the American warships arrived they joined those of the other nations in sending bluejackets ashore to preserve order and protect the property of the foreign population. Though this outbreak is in no way directly aimed at the missionaries or other Europeans or Americans, they may still suffer from the general lawlessness of the times. Their residences are apt to offer considerable temptation to the bandits, who compose a large proportion of the revolutionary force.

The belief that Christian missionaries are not in especial danger on account of the revolt in Kwang-Tung has been expressed by the Rev. William E. Strong, editorial secretary of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions. The American Board maintains two mission stations in south China, one at Canton and the other at Hongkong, with several out-stations to the southwest of Canton, a little to the south of the territory where the revolt is in progress. The station at Canton is in charge of the Rev. Charles A. Nelson. With him are the Rev. Obed Johnson, Miss Edna Lowry, and Miss Ruth Mulliken. Mr. Nelson is a graduate of Oberlin College. His home address is Providence, Ill. His wife, who was Miss Jeannette May Elmore of Liberty, N. J., is with him. Mr. Johnson's home is at Lanyo, Webster County, Ia. There are mission stations at Woo-Chow, the scene of fighting and pillage.

A Scene Along the Water Front at Canton, China

In that part of the Province of Kwang-Tung which lies west of the longitude of Hongkong, but not including the Island of Hainan, there are thirteen mission stations at which American missionaries are resident. At some of these stations there are British or German missionaries also, and other stations in addition to the thirteen are occupied only by British or German missionaries.

Canton is by far the strongest station, no fewer than ten American organizations being represented there. The other twelve stations are Fat-Shan, Kong-Mun, Lien-Chow, Lo-ting-Chow, Macao, Pak-Hoi, Shek-Lung, Shiu-Shing, Suilam, Tak-Hing, Yeou-Kong, and Ying-Tak. The American societies having the most missionaries, given in the order of the strength of their mission forces, are as follows: Board of Foreign Missions of the Presbyterian Church (headquarters at New York City); Foreign Mission Board of the Southern Baptist Convention (Richmond, Va.); Foreign Missionary Society of the United Brethren in Christ (Dayton, O.); Canton Christian College, interdenominational (New York City); Seventh Day Adventist Mission Board (Washington, D. C.), and American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, Congregational (Boston, Mass.) The total number of American missionaries at work in the region is 145—66 men (ordained and unordained); 45 wives, and 34 single women.

General Notes

—AT THE DINNER of the Associated Press and the American Newspaper Publishers' Association in New York on April 27, President Taft, talking on the annexation of Canada, declared it "all bosh" and "a platform joke." This ought to put a quietus on the absurd talk in which not a few newspapers have indulged in discussing reciprocity.

—THAT OUTSPOKEN Briton, Mr. W. T. Stead, whose utterances have a momentum that is sometimes uncomfortable, has lately been discussing the hitherto indifferent attitude of the British churches toward peace. It seems that although the Lord Mayor of London suggested the formation of a National Peace Committee by the churches of the whole country, only a few responded. This attitude Mr. Stead stoutly condemns, and urges the Established Church to rouse itself to the present opportunity, when the whole nation is expecting every branch of the Church to co-operate in the general peace movement.

Organize for World Peace

IN OBEDIENCE to a widespread and urgent request, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has undertaken the work of organizing Peace Circles throughout the country. It invites the most cordial co-operation on the part of its readers in this great work for Christianity and humanity. All other questions are overshadowed by this one dominating topic—how to bring about world peace and thus, under divine blessing, advance the Kingdom of the Prince of Peace. A few days ago our third National Peace Congress met in Baltimore with delegates from many lands in attendance. It was formally opened by the President of the United States. It is especially fitting, therefore, that the present time should be chosen in which to begin a national peace movement on popular yet simple and practical lines, in order that the principles of the movement may be thoroughly understood and that peace-lovers everywhere in this land may be organized for effective service in this great and sacred cause. Readers and their friends who will undertake the organization of Peace Circles in their neighborhoods will receive all necessary information on sending full name and address to "PEACE CIRCLE DEPARTMENT, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York City."

The Sacred Ark of the Jews

ALTHOUGH this is an age of surprising discoveries in Oriental lands, it would be remarkable indeed beyond all precedent if the story, which comes from Jerusalem of the discovery and removal of the Ark of the Covenant by a party of English archæologists, should prove to be true. For many ages the hiding-place of the Ark has been an unsolved mystery. There is a Jewish tradition that its whereabouts would not be revealed until the final restoration of the ancient people. According to the report referred to, the explorers in extending their excavations, followed an old underground passage beneath the Mosque of Omar, where the Ark, the Censer and other sacred vessels are said to have been found. It is added that the Mohammedans in Jerusalem are greatly exercised over what they regard as a profanation of the mosque. We should prefer to await authoritative corroboration of the "find" before crediting the story, as the discovery may prove to exist only in the Moslem imagination. If indeed it should be true, it will be of an importance sufficient to dwarf all other discoveries in recent years. The sacred Ark of the Jews, known as the "Ark of the Covenant," the "Ark of God" and the "Ark of the Law," was of oblong shape, made of shittim (acacia) wood and covered on all sides with pure gold. Over the top stood the golden figures of two cherubim. In it are believed to have been deposited the pot of manna and the rod of Aaron, the tables of the Law and possibly other sacred relics. When the temple was plundered and demolished by the Babylonians, it was generally believed that the Ark was carried away or destroyed; but the Hebrews themselves asserted that it was securely hidden by their own leaders and would remain unrevealed until the coming of the Messiah.

How They Welcomed the Foodship

AS ONE reads the letters of the missionaries and their co-laborers describing the arrival in China of the relief ship Buford with her life-saving cargo, the scenes are impressed upon the mind in a way not soon to be forgotten. After days and weeks of waiting she came like a great blessing from over the seas. With her she brought glorious weather of brilliant sunshine, dispelling the storms and rains that had been continuous for many days. America's generous gift filled forty railroad cars and was quickly apportioned among the needy districts. That gift to which the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD so largely contributed is now feeding 160,000 famine sufferers. It is true that the flour will only suffice to satisfy a portion of the vast need; but we pray that God in his infinite goodness may bless it and multiply it to the saving of many precious lives. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is thankful to have been the channel of this blessed benevolence and to have shared in any way with the splendid effort made by its generous readers in China's behalf at this trying time.

A Gigantic Experiment

CHANCELLOR LLOYD GEORGE'S scheme of insurance against physical disability and unemployment, which is just now being considered in the English Commons, is a gigantic one. It provides for a three-fold source of contribution, viz.: the wage-earner, the employer and the State. Over 14,000,000 persons are affected by the proposed legislation. Among its features are the establishment of a chain of sanatoria for consumption, the more liberal payment of doctors and the support of sick workers. Those who are responsible for their own financial and physical misfortunes and invite incapacity will receive medical treatment but no insurance. Every worker whose wages aggregate $800 yearly would be compulsorily insured so that during illness he would receive $1.20 weekly while incapacitated. No payments would be made where the insured was idle through a strike or a lockout. The weekly assessment would be about eight cents for a man and six for a woman. The Chancellor estimated that the entire plan would cost about $35,000,000 for the first year and $100,000,000 the second year, the State's contribution being one-third. Should it pass, it must be ranked as one of the most remarkable legislative experiments in the history of the world.

Anger and Fear Destroy the Brain

SCIENCE is sounding a warning which is quite in keeping with Paul's exhortation to "put off all these: anger, wrath, malice," and his statement that "fear hath torment." Dr. George Crile, Professor of Clinical Surgery at the Western Reserve University, described before the American Philosophical Society the other day the effect of fear and anger on the brain. He showed that the mind is greatly impaired and the brain cells disintegrated through fear or anger. Dr. Crile presented also his theory for a remedy. He said:

> It has occurred to me to utilize as an antidote for fear and worry an appeal to the same great law to which the origin of fear is due, namely, the law of self-preservation. I have found that if an intelligent patient suffering from fear is made to see, so plainly as to amount to a firm conviction, that his brain, and indeed his whole being, was physically damaged by fear, this same instinct of self-preservation will, in proportion to his conviction, banish worry and fear. It is hurling a threatened active, militant danger, whose ravages are both certain and known, against an uncertain, perhaps a fancied one. In other words, fear itself is an injury which, when recognized, is instinctively avoided. In a precisely similar manner anger may be softened or banished by an appeal to the stronger instinct of fear of physical damage, such as the physical injury of brain cells. This play of one primitive instinct against another is to be compared with the effect upon two men quarreling, when a more powerful enemy of both comes threateningly on the scene.

Dr. Crile's scientific researches in the realm of the emotions seem to be incomplete. It is strange that he should demonstrate so thoroughly the emotional poisons, and miss completely the real antidote which has been known and urged for nineteen centuries. There is only one perfect antidote for anger and fear, and that is love. It is impossible to be angry with one we love. It is impossible to dread the future when the love which brings complete trust in God's wisdom and goodness fills the heart. As Paul says, "There is no fear in love; but perfect love casteth out fear."

The Spirit of Maine

BANGOR has shown the true American spirit. Though swept by fire until little was left of its business section but a line of smoking ruins, it rises indomitable and begins at once the heroic task of building a new and better city than the old. Before the smoke had cleared, the plans were under way, and it was bravely decided, too, that the work of reconstruction should be done by Bangor men and money; not to satisfy a false pride, but simply to show to the country that the famous town can "take care of its own." After all, we cannot help liking the old-fashioned spirit of independence of these sturdy men of Maine. So with the sons of Massachusetts when Boston was burned and with the independent Illinois men when Chicago had her historic continental blaze, and the courageous Californians when San Francisco's conflagration lit up the western sea-gate after the awful earthquake. It is the American spirit, unconquerable, and smiling at disaster, which rises superior to passing adversities that might easily overwhelm weaker natures. Next to faith in God, faith in ourselves is essential to all human progress, and the people of Bangor have shown, in their present visitation, that they possess both. May blessing and prosperity follow their fiery trial.

The Chinese Outbreak

CHINA, land of famines, is also a land of revolutions. In Kwangtung province, far south of the famine provinces of Anhui and Kiangsu, a formidable rebellion has broken out against the constituted authorities. Beginning at Canton, it has spread rapidly throughout the country-side. Led by an educated Chinese named Wu Sum, it is not an anti-foreign rising, but a revolt against the ruling Manchu dynasty. Fortunately the cable reports that the missionaries are not in any especial danger. Warships are rushing from Hongkong and other ports for their protection. Meanwhile, the missionaries, though protected, need the prayers of their friends at home that they may be brought safely through this new peril and that their work may not sustain any serious setback. Thus far, foreigners have escaped harm. There are several foreign warships, American, British, German and Portuguese, which may be relied upon in the present emergency.

THE SITUATION IN MEXICO

—THE DISPATCHES which had been received from Mexico up to May 5 told of the continuation of the revolution and held out but slight hope of immediate peace. Although the peace negotiations are still in progress, their success seems very doubtful. Senor Madero insists on the immediate announcement of General Diaz's resignation as the chief means of promoting a settlement. Even during the armistice which followed the fighting at Agua Prieta, during which the town of Douglas, Ariz., was under fire, a number of engagements took place. Ojinaga was attacked and fresh outbreaks took place in Zacatecas and at Torreon, Durango City, Puebla and Vera Cruz. In only three of the thirty-four States and Territories is there peace at the present time. These are two of the southern States and the Federal District about the City of Mexico. Yet even here there is great discontent. The capital is practically in a state of siege. Train-loads of foreigners have already started for the coast, and those who are left are organizing a sort of police force for their own protection. The insurrectos have been reported within ten miles of the national palace, and have captured Cuernavaca, which is a famous mountain health resort seventy-four miles from the City of Mexico. The whole country is in a turbulent state; all industry and commerce are suspended; neither life nor property is safe. The general unsettled spirit and the extreme views made public every day have affected the Congress, and much of the recent legislation is of an extravagant and puerile kind. General Reyes sailed from Europe on May 3, and will doubtless yet reach home in time to be of great assistance to his people.

Bangor's Furious Burning

NEXT to the Portland conflagration, the fire in Bangor, Sunday night, April 30, was the most destructive that the State of Maine ever had. The fire began, it is said, with a lighted cigarette thrown by a poker player into a pile of hay in Bacon & Robinson's coal sheds about five o'clock Sunday afternoon, and, swept by a fierce wind, it consumed the buildings of one third of the city. The burnt district extends from the junction of the Kenduskeag stream and the Penobscot River to Broadway Park, and on the other side from Main and Centre Streets to Grove Street, which includes forty city blocks. This cleared out about all of the business section, and cut wickedly into the residential neighborhoods. The miracle is that there was so little loss of life; as it was, two precious lives were sacrificed. Embers fell on John L. Scribner and he immediately became a living torch, and with screams rushed toward a burning building, whose wall fell upon him and crushed him. A falling brick struck George Abbott on the head and killed him. Every public building except the Court House went down before the flames. Seven churches were in the path of ruin. The property loss is from three to five millions, and several thousand of the people were rendered homeless and destitute. The people outside of the burnt districts opened their houses to those who had been made homeless, and even then there was not room for them, and many had to camp in the streets, where there was not a little suffering. Had it not been for a heavy rainstorm and the shifting of the wind at eight o'clock Monday morning, the disaster would have been still more horrible. The self-reliance of the city is superbly voiced in this message from the Mayor: "Bangor will get its breath and courage, and then we will go right at building again. We are going to find out first how many there are in the city who are without homes, and then we will begin to clean up and open the streets. I have received offers of help from Boston, Portland and other cities, but I believe that we are going to be able to take care of our unfortunate ones without their aid. We shall not accept any aid until we find out that it is absolutely necessary." The spirit of the city, expressed by its head, was an illustration of Yankee enterprise gratifying to the nation, and reminds us of the emergency call which Nehemiah made to rebuild the walls of Jerusalem after the city had been devastated and the gates burnt with fire:

A Section of the Ruins of Bangor, Me., After the Great Fire

Ye see the distress that we are in, how Jerusalem lieth waste, and the gates thereof are burned with fire: come and let us build up the wall of Jerusalem. (Neh. 2: 17.)

Unsubstantial Homes

Mrs. Robert Grau has written a letter to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD which contains this description of a wonderful people: "There is a colony of people in New Orleans, called the Batture folks. They get their name because they live on the Batture, a land deposited by the waters which continually wash up sand and earth from the great river toward the Algiers side, and is constantly being enlarged. It costs nothing to the people who dwell there, as the land is not really land in the true sense of the word. At certain seasons the river rises, and there is no land left; this season lasts for several weeks, or perhaps months. The Batture people build their cozy homes with bottoms like a boat; when the water rises, the houses rest on the water, and when it subsides, they settle back on an elevation of wood (attached to the houses) upon the earth again. The people take advantage at that time to plant their gardens of vegetables (not a few have very beautiful flower gardens); and they are not disturbed again until everything has matured and been harvested. They send their children to the public schools; they have no rent or taxes to pay, and thus they live happily and respectably, enjoying the finest bounties of nature that God can give." These homes that seem so unsubstantial are types of the instability of earthly estates. The green fields and cotton fields and orchards are held by deed for a few seasons, until the sheriff or the undertaker shall come and evict them, thus reminding us of earth's mutabilities:

For here have we no continuing city, but we seek one to come. (Heb. 13:14.)

Immigration of Dutch Farmers

Many of the Dutch have quit taking Holland and are now taking parts of our Northwest. About every steamer of the Holland-American Line reaching New York from Rotterdam is bringing from three hundred to four hundred farmers—sturdy weather-bronzed men with wives and children dressed in quaint Dutch costumes—for North Dakota, Iowa and Wisconsin. The steamer Noordam brought three hundred of these thrifty yeomen of the Netherlands last week. The places of the farmers who went from our Northwest to Canada are being rapidly occupied by this robust stock from the dykes, canals and meadows of Holland. The land of Holland is more and more falling into the hands of the rich, and less and less are the opportunities for the intelligent, industrious and ambitious middle classes in the agricultural districts. Rents are so high that the tenants cannot more than make a bare living, and the farm hands have great difficulty in making both ends meet. The immigrants on the Noordam were a happy lot. There was no evidence of race suicide, as in several instances eight, ten and twelve children gathered in cheerfulness about proud parents. The men averaged nearly $1,000 apiece in ready cash; some had their household goods, and a few in their innocence brought their out-of-date farming implements; but they all knew where they were going and what they were going for, and they will make a good contribution to our composite national life. We have had rather more than our share of weak, shiftless and criminal immigration in recent years, and it is with satisfaction and hope that we hail such newcomers as these Dutch, with their thrift, industry and integrity. Since the days of the Exodus men have moved from place to place to improve their condition. The happy, hopeful spirit of the Dutch immigrants on their way to their new home reminds us of that of Moses in his invitation to Hobab:

We are journeying unto the place of which the Lord said, I will give it you: come thou with us, and we will do thee good; for the Lord hath spoken good concerning Israel. (Num. 10:29.)

Carload of Babies

The proportion of the babies to older people in certain parts of Texas is so small that those regions are calling upon certain cities of the East to supply the deficiency. The request of the cities from the United Charities Association of the East is that carloads of babies be sent; they must be Americans and in good condition. The association at Fort Worth, Texas, sent an urgent order to New York for a shipment of babies between the ages of two months and three years. A carload of sixty-six New York babies had passed through Fort Worth on their way to Houston, where homes had already been found for them. The plea to let a few of them remain at Fort Worth was not granted, but a carload of their own will arrive from New York in the near future. This is as it should be. No community or civilization is complete without the little folks. Those homes that have never had any children, or which, having had them, have lost them, should adopt some boy or girl, or boys and girls, in the interest of humanity and in the interest of the development and happiness of the home into which the dear little ones have been taken. There is the risk, to be sure, of bad blood, of corrupt lineage on one or both sides; but good education and a religious environment will provide against many of these perils, and will contribute immeasurably to the happiness of humanity and the promotion of the kingdom of God. The adoption of spiritual waifs by the heart of the infinite Father, through the mission of Christ, is thus referred to:

To redeem them that were under the law, that we might receive the adoption of sons. (Gal. 4:5.)

Companion of the Birds

The Governor of Virginia asked the people of the Old Dominion to observe May 4, the birthday of John James Audubon, as Bird Day. New York, Pennsylvania, Kentucky, Louisiana, in all of which States the naturalist had his home, and, in fact, all of the States of the commonwealth, could have joined heartily in such a request and celebration. This son of a French admiral was born in New Orleans. He was a genuine artist. As many such men have done, he blundered at one kind of business after another and failed, declined the life of a naval officer which his father had marked out for him, and went to the woods in his passionate love of nature and kept the company of the birds, which he preferred to that of people. He is the father of bird knowledge in this country, and it is likely will be the best authority on birds for centuries to come. He was a true artist and he painted the feathered creatures in the comeliness of their form and in the exquisite beauty of their plumage. When mice made a nest in the box containing the drawings representing years of search and toil and cut them into lint, he went to bed sick, and two days after he arose, went back to the forest, where he remained three years, reproduced his specimens, greatly increased their number, and turned his calamity into a blessing. At the last he lived in New York City and his body rests in Trinity Cemetery, while the birds sing and the children play in the public park named after him. Audubon's love for the birds and his fidelity to them with pen and brush gave him a place among the great naturalists of the world. His mastery of the feathered songsters is in obedience to the Divine command to the race through its head:

Have dominion over the fowl of the air. (Gen. 1:28.)

America and Japan Friendly

At the dinner of the American Asiatic Society in New York City recently, Ambassador Uchida made an address in which he ridiculed the folly of the war talk between his and our country. Noticing the stars of the American flag and the sun on his own flag, he remarked "that the sun and the stars had never quarreled in their courses. There is one glory of the sun, and another glory of the moon, and one star differs from another star in glory; but, gentlemen, there is room in the ample gulfs of the sky, there is room in the spacious purposes of history for the glory of all." With his Oriental imagination he was expressing the thought that there was an abundance of room in the Pacific Ocean for both Japan and America. The area of the Pacific is 55,000,000 square miles. It would take all the earth of the globe to cover it nicely, so that those who think because we have possessions in the Pacific that we are cooped up in a pond with Japan, where competitions will make war inevitable, are forgetting how wide and long the Pacific Ocean is, and that there is ample room in it for all the navies of commerce in the world. Uchida illustrated his thought by a quotation from the fifteenth chapter of First Corinthians. International friendliness which he suggested in obedience to the harmony of the stars recalls the question asked a long time ago:

Canst thou bind the sweet influences of Pleiades, or loose the bands of Orion? (Job 38:31.)

International Peace Drawing Near*

Sunday School Lesson by Dr. and Mrs. W. F. Crafts

DR. MOFFAT, the celebrated South African missionary, tells a humorous story of a shepherd who had been converted by reading the New Testament. He had been very wayward, but the teachings of Jesus had made him quite a new boy. One day he came to Dr. Moffat in much distress, telling him that their big watchdog had got hold of the book and had torn a page out of it. Dr. Moffat comforted him by saying it was no matter, for he could get another Testament.

But the boy was not at all comforted. "Think of the dog," he said. Dr. Moffat laughed, and said, "If your dog can crunch an ox-bone, he is not going to be hurt by a bit of paper." Dr. Moffat supposed that the boy thought that the paper would hurt the dog's teeth, but that was not it. "Oh, Papa Moffat," he cried, "I was once a bad boy. If I had an enemy I hated him, and everything in me wanted to kill him. Then I got the New Testament in my heart, and began to love everything and forgave all my enemies, and now the dog, the great, big hunting-dog, has got the blessed Book in him, and will begin to love the lions and the tigers, and let them help themselves to the sheep and the oxen."

Not only the New Testament but the Old, as we see in to-day's lesson, teaches peaceableness, not alone among individuals but also among nations. We still need these lessons, however, for in the very last Christmas season, when our cherubic children were celebrating the 1910th anniversary of the angel song of "peace on earth," the new 13½-inch cannon of the British dreadnought battleships, that cost $1,000 a shot, were driving Germany to the manufacture of 14-inch man-killers. Even Canada, Australia and New Zealand, the foremost foreign commonwealths of the world, morally and socially, were being drawn into the "big navy" craze, which has also cast its spell over the United States. However, President Taft has this year made a peace proposal, which we shall presently discuss, that the British Foreign Secretary describes as "more momentous than any statesman in his position [that is, as the chief executive of any great nation] has ventured to say before."

The Need of Peace Teachings

But first let us see what the Bible teaches about international peace. Before we study the Divine promise of peace in Micah, let us glance at some earlier Scriptures. The very first page of the Bible is a mighty peace lesson, for it teaches human brotherhood. "Have we not all one father? Hath not one God created us?" The very first murder is another peace lesson, showing the moral ugliness of every Cain who kills his brother, whether by retail or wholesale. Many godly men were warriors in the early ages when law was weak, and the conceptions of human rights were dim; and the individual and the nation must often fight in self-defense. Godly men even fought wars of conquest. But God plainly showed his general disapproval of war when he withheld from David as a man of blood the privilege of building the temple, and turned the honor over to his son Solomon (I. Chron. 28: 3). One of the brightest visions of the prophets was of a coming day when, through the influence of the Christ upon individual convictions and social customs, the nations should "not learn war any more." Hosea (2: 18) prophesies, speaking in God's name: "I will break the bow and the sword and the battle out of the earth, and I will make them to lie down safely." Isaiah (2: 4), as well as Micah, prophesies, "They shall beat their swords into plowshares, and their spears into pruning hooks."

And now we come to Micah's yet unfulfilled picture of world peace in the lesson for to-day, which was uttered in Jerusalem, 710 B.C.

"He shall judge between many peoples and shall reprove strong nations." There are some premillennarians who see in the opening words of this lesson a picture of a literal uplifting of Mount Zion "above all other mountains," for a rallying point at "the coming of God's own King to rule in Zion over all nations." And we are told that it is through such a coming of Christ to a visible throne in Jerusalem, "not through great peace conferences," that international peace is to be secured (see Torrey's Gist of the Lesson). But the general view of Christian scholars is that this is a picture of the ultimate triumph of Christ's teachings, when such a world court as is already developing at The Hague shall "judge among many peoples, and rebuke strong nations afar off; and they shall beat their swords into plowshares, and their spears into pruning hooks; nation shall not lift up a sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more. But they shall sit every one under his vine and under his fig tree; and none shall make them afraid: for the mouth of the Lord hath spoken it." The remaining verses of the lesson but repeat the promise of a United States of the World over which Christ shall reign in the recognition of his laws as the rule of international as well as personal relations.

Let us hasten to see whether there has been any approach to the fulfilment of the Bible promises that love and law should take the place of war. It is not an accident that the first world parliament for judging between nations and promoting peace followed the great Reformation—the treaty of Westphalia, in 1648, at the close of the Thirty Years' War, when the many nations involved met, and the smaller nations unitedly curbed the power of Austria in the interest of a proper "balance of power," such as would prevent any one nation lording it, as Rome had done, over all the others. Of like significance were the treaty of Utrecht, 1713, which curbed the power of France; and the treaties of Reichenbach, 1813, of Paris, 1814, and of Vienna, 1815, for the purpose of curbing Napoleon and undoing his work; and the treaty of London, 1827, against Turkey, in behalf of Greece; and the treaty of Paris, 1856, and of Berlin, 1878, both aiming to curb Russia. The school histories are many of them greatly at fault in giving such prominence to the wars of Europe that our boys and girls miss the supreme fact that after the greatest wars had wasted wealth and life, the great powers, Great Britain, France, Prussia, Austria, Russia, regularly convened what was really an intermittent court of nations, and decided just how much, if any, of conquered territory the conqueror should retain. The battle of Leipsic, where five nations fought, four of those named above against France, is called "the Battle of the Nations," but every boy and girl should know that such a title belongs most of all to that supreme battle of diplomats in Bismarck's office, when he sat as umpire, and with Lord Salisbury and Disraeli took from Gortchakoff, as the representative of Russia, about all the Balkan territory that country had won by rivers of blood. Strange that after such international courts, known as "the concert of Europe," had become the European habit, the nations did not have sense enough to assemble the court before fighting rather than after.

This logic, perhaps, prompted Nicholas II., the Emperor of Russia, to summon the first Hague Conference in 1898. Many laughed, and even continued to sneer when the court had met and made some important additions to international law in the interest of peace. But when the United States actually submitted a case to The Hague Court, it was clear to men of vision that the world had reached at last the beginning of the end of international war. The second Hague Conference still further mitigated the customs of war. (See condensation of its action in Craft's Internationalism, p. 32).

Another force that has been working for peace side by side with these treaties of the "concert of Europe" at the end of wars, has been the increasing use of arbitration by disputing nations, as a substitute for war. In a hundred years from the time Washington inaugurated international arbitration, there were two hundred such peaceful settlements of national disputes that might in earlier ages have led to war; and not one award was rejected, though there was no power to enforce it save that invisible force, second only to the omnipotence of God, the power of international public sentiment. If ever we should need more material force we have it in reserve in "diplomatic isolation," the withdrawal of ambassadors and consuls by all nations favoring arbitration, with consequent destruction of the offending nation's commerce. No international army or navy will ever be needed save against savage and half civilized peoples, such as might appropriately be constituted on a small scale if the Panama Canal were neutralized, to protect it against the insurrectionary Spanish-Americans.

World Peace in Sight

American school children studying history, and too much inclined to miss the victories of peace, all should be made aware that one of the greatest acts of history has just occurred in their own land in the following declaration by President Taft, on March 22, 1910, in a speech before the National Arbitration and Peace League:

"I HAVE NOTICED EXCEPTIONS IN OUR ARBITRATION TREATIES AS TO REFERENCE OF QUESTIONS OF NATIONAL HONOR TO COURTS OF ARBITRATION. PERSONALLY, I DO NOT SEE ANY MORE REASON WHY MATTERS OF NATIONAL HONOR SHOULD NOT BE REFERRED TO A COURT OF ARBITRATION THAN MATTERS OF PROPERTY OR MATTERS OF NATIONAL PROPRIETORSHIP."

The British Foreign Secretary, Sir Edward Grey, declared in the British Parliament that, in his judgment, a statement of this kind made by a man of Mr. Taft's position should not go without response, and added: "We should be delighted to receive such a proposal. I should feel it something so far-reaching in its consequence that it required not only the signature of both governments, but the deliberately decided sanction of Parliament. That I believe would be obtained. . . . The great nations of the earth are in bondage, increasing bondage, and it is not impossible that in some of the future years they will discover, as individuals have discovered, that the law is a better remedy than force, and that, in all the time they have been in bondage, the prison door has been locked on the inside."

These words of President Taft and Sir Edward Grey have been endorsed by a great chorus of approval throughout the British Empire and the United States, and the enactment seems assured of such a treaty, first between the two English-speaking nations and soon afterwards by many nations, followed later by a general law of compulsory arbitration. The shrewd capitalists of Europe have concluded "that the public funds and investments of powerless Holland and Sweden (any day at the mercy of their big neighbors) are from 10 to 20 per cent. safer than those of the greatest Power of continental Europe." Here is a subtle recognition that big armies and navies invite and provoke war. Nearly all the sophistries of militarism can be exposed by applying them to individuals. Long ago men learned the folly of every man going about loaded with arms and armor, when they could settle their quarrels in open court and reserve their energies for useful work. Disarmament of nations is required by similar economic considerations, and when the chief powers agree to substitute law for war it is equally practicable. This is being seen alike by churches and chambers of commerce and labor unions, and the years of our Lord 1910 and 1911 are moving swifter than any before to the goal of peace, led on by great statesmen, and peace societies new and old, which are stronger and more active than ever before.

How they Welcomed the "Buford"

Joy in Chin-kiang Over the Foodship's Cargo, Which Now Is Sustaining 160,000 Famine Sufferers

OUR American Consul-General at Shanghai, Amos P. Wilder, has sent to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD an official account of the arrival and distribution of the cargo of the relief troopship Buford, which gives many interesting details. He writes:

"The officers of the Buford told me that the voyage to the Orient was through rough seas; but there was harmony on board between the army and marine representatives, and the embassy was a success in all ways. On arrival at Woosung, the Buford was met by Deputy Consul-General J. K. Davis of this office, a son of a Nanking missionary, and who speaks Chinese. Dr. J. C. Ferguson, chairman of the Relief Committee, one of the active men of China, adviser to high Chinese officials, owner of the Shanghai Times, was there to greet the ship, as were Chinese officials. The Legation at Peking had co-operated in urging Chinese and railway officials to have perfected preparation for prompt handling of the cargo, and delivery was made at Chin-kiang of a third of the cargo to go to northern Kiangsu province; and the balance at Pukow (directly opposite Nanking) to reach the larger district of northern Anhui province.

Some of the Officials Who Aided in the Distribution of the Buford's Cargo

This last distribution is largely in the hands of Messrs. E. C. Lobenstine, Morris and Cochrane, Yale and Princeton men, of great sense as well as goodness. The great work done by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in this and previous famines has made the name of your paper familiar to the Chinese generally.

"Your idea of setting apart colonies of orphans and training them up is statesmanlike. I have one of your boys, taken from Mr. Malone's orphanage in Nanking, now in a school in Shanghai. If among your thousands of boys you should develop one leader who could help China out of her difficulties, or even put one of these provinces of 40,000,000 people in the way of progressive and efficient government, the investment would perhaps equal Mr. Carnegie's in far-reaching usefulness. I have long thought that a fund might well be set aside for the advanced and complete training of individual boys and girls who show unusual powers and promise. In nearly every school there is some one pupil who the teachers agree is beyond his fellows in natural equipment. If there could be the assurance of encouragement and support of these occasional 'stars,' not all would meet the expectation, but here and there would be one of unfolding power. The history of nations is that of individuals, of type-men; and while education for the mass is good, it is a wise system that builds up those specially endowed.

"The Shanghai Famine Committee has received about 125,000 gold in cash. A large amount has come from America otherwise placed.

"Again congratulating you on the great work your journal is doing for humanity—how far-reaching the service in kindling many virtues and in binding together diverse races, you cannot realize at home—I am very truly yours,

"AMOS P. WILDER."

Owing to the sickness of Rev. J. B. Webster, of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Missionary Committee at Chin-kiang, the duty of superintending the unloading of the Buford's cargo of flour devolved upon Mr. Walker, the Chairman of the Committee. He writes us of date April 7:

Before daylight on March 31 we were on the lookout, and just as light was breaking in the East we could see the gray hulls of the big vessel, and in a short time she swung past the Silver Island and dropped anchor in midstream. Soon we were alongside and had the pleasure of welcoming the good ship once more to Chin-kiang. What a joy it was to see the stately vessel and to find some old friends on board! All was stir and bustle. The Standard Oil Company kindly placed their launch at our disposal, and visitors and friends had an opportunity of inspecting the ship with her precious cargo. Soon our augmented band of workers were hard at it, superintending unloading into the six Chinese junks alongside, and by seven o'clock in the evening 16,000 bags of flour were allocated to their destinations.

It had been decided to discharge the balance of the Buford's cargo at Nanking, fifty miles further up river, and next morning unloading began there close to the Pukow wharf. China has wisely begun to lay railways in various parts of the empire, and the expeditious way this food for starving millions was carried up into the interior must have, even to the most conservative Chinese, contrasted strangely with the old means of transit. To see that long line of forty special cars, each with its designation—FAMINE RELIEF—painted in conspicuous white letters, was an imposing sight indeed; and if it brought strength and encouragement to us who were facing this calamity from the outside, what must it have meant to those poor creatures in the interior, who were living on roots or grass?

A remarkable feature of our operations was the good weather we enjoyed. For weeks it had been raining, but from start to finish of our work we were favored by dry weather. We have the warmest appreciation of the courtesy and consideration shown by Captain Creary and the officers and crew of the Buford; and it is greatly owing to their co-operation that the work of transportation was so satisfactorily accomplished. We would also voice the feeling of gratitude felt by every missionary engaged in this humane work, for the magnanimous generosity of the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in aiding stricken China in this her hour of direst need.

Chairman J. C. Ferguson of the Shanghai Relief Committee writes of date April 10:

I boarded the Buford when she arrived at Woosung, and took along with me several members of our Committee, including Mr. Shen Tun-ho, the Chinese chairman. We gave them as cordial a reception as possible. The Viceroy at Nanking sent Taotai S. T. Tseng, a graduate of Yale University, who accompanied the party of American Commercial Commissioners visiting China last autumn. The Governor of Anhui also sent a representative and so did Consul-General Wilder; so that, all in all, it made an impressive showing. I went with the Buford to Chin-kiang, where she discharged 16,000 fifty-pound sacks of flour during the day. She left for Nanking during the night, and was alongside the wharf at Pukow, opposite Nanking, at daylight on Saturday, April 1. She discharged cargo all day on Saturday, and we loaded sixteen cars, which were sent off into the famine district Sunday night, where they were unloaded during the night into boats, and by Monday noon all were on their way to our centres of distribution. No cargo was worked on Sunday, but the discharging was finished on Monday. Every honor possible was shown to the ship by the Chinese authorities. The ship discharged at Nanking the following: 23,404 sacks flour; 20 sacks sweepings of flour; 433 sacks wheat; 5 sacks rolled oats; 58 sacks potatoes; 42 cases condensed milk; 15 cases pilot bread.

This is to be distributed by Mr. Lobenstine and his associates at the following places: Mengchen, 50 per cent.; Koyang, 25 per cent.; Pochow, 25 per cent. Along with this wheat, we shipped 3,000 piculs of beancake, which will be distributed at the same time, and will not only make the flour go further, but will provide a food more easily suitable to the needs of the people. At the present time, there are depending upon our Committee in northern Anhui the following numbers: Mengchen, 150,000 persons; Koyang, 75,000 persons; Pochow, 75,000 persons.

We plan to distribute seven or eight pounds per capita, which will be sufficient food for fifteen days. Our committee is following this distribution of flour by another distribution of kaoliang, which can be used not only for food, but for planting purposes.

In northern Kiangsu, 400 tons of flour (16,000 sacks) were distributed as follows: Pichow, 120 tons; Suining, 120 tons; Suchien, 80 tons; Hsuchowfu, 55 tons; Tsingkiangpu, 25 tons. Along with this was distributed 2,000 piculs of beancake, and this was divided among about 160,000 persons.

Our committee appreciates greatly what THE CHRISTIAN HERALD readers have done. It is marvelous that your paper has been able to elicit so large an interest in this famine, which has followed so rapidly upon that of four years ago.

Train of Forty Carloads of American Flour from the Buford Starting for the Interior

Missionary Wade D. Bostick writes from Pochow under date March 17, that for two months there has been a great deal of snow, hail and rain. The suffering and loss of life during that time have been beyond conception. Hungry and almost naked sufferers are to be seen in the streets, while wandering over the country are hundreds of thousands of destitute. Little children are sold for anywhere from five cents to fifty cents apiece or simply abandoned. The cities are full of beggars. Every day the dead are picked up on the highways. Mr. Bostick at this writing had 200 destitute men working for him, at between three and four cents a day, such allowance being sufficient to buy food for two persons or even three. Many have had their feet frozen in the bitter weather and are unable to walk. Shallow graves are dug for the dead, which are easily scratched up by stray dogs. The Famine Committee in his district are trying to help about one-third of the destitute and they have the cordial co-operation of the local officials and gentry. Sweet potatoes, leaves, weeds and tree bark, with an occasional handful of grain thrown in, constituted the food of many in North Kiangsu this winter.

Among the contributions received for the Relief Fund by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD recently was a sum of $200 contributed by the citizens of Sparta, Ill., and forwarded through Mr. James Alexander, treasurer of the First National Bank of Sparta.

Mr. James Tanis of Paterson, N. J., on May 3 sent another notable contribution of $240.30 to the China Famine Fund. This sum, collected through the Sabbath School Bode from Sunday Schools and societies of the Christian Reformed Church in America, brings the contributions from that source up to the remarkable total of $5,001.21.

The German Methodist congregation, Klemme, Ia., recently sent $56, and the Germantown, Ia., congregation $87, a total of $143 raised for China relief by the Women's Foreign Missionary Societies in these congregations.

Peace Advocates at Baltimore

The Opening of the Third National Peace Congress at Baltimore, May 3

SURROUNDED by a group of distinguished men, which included Andrew Carnegie, Secretary of War Dickinson, Hamilton Holt of New York, Dr. J. A. Macdonald of Toronto, Senator Gore of Oklahoma, and a large number of well known clergymen of all denominations, President Taft opened the Third National Peace Congress on May 3 at Baltimore. This gathering was held under the auspices of all the leading societies in America devoted to the settlement of international disputes by other means than resort to war. The Lyric Theatre, where the sessions were held, was packed by an enthusiastic audience at the opening meeting, and all the sessions of the Congress were well attended. The audiences seemed deeply interested and by their hearty applause endorsed the sentiments of the speakers. In his opening speech the President said in part:

The State Department at Washington has no more important or absorbing duty than to lend its good offices to the twenty republics of this hemisphere to prevent their various differences from leading to war. And not to go back of this administration there have been four instances in which the action of our State Department, taken in connection with some of the influential countries of South America, has absolutely prevented war, which twenty or thirty years ago would certainly have ensued.

The recurrence of war is not now as frequent between stable and powerful governments maintaining law and order within their respective borders as it is in those governments which do not exercise complete control over their people, and in which revolutions and insurrections break out, not only to the injury and danger of the people and their property and of the government itself but to the disturbance of all the world in their neighborhood. It is with reference to disturbance of this kind that the United States and the other great republics of this hemisphere must exercise their kindly and peaceful influence as much as possible.

One of the difficulties that the United States finds is the natural suspicion that the countries engaged have of the motives which the United States has in tendering its good offices. Asseveration of good faith helps but little where the suspicion is real, and yet I like to avail myself of an opportunity in such presence as this to assert that there is not in the whole length and breadth of the United States among its people any desire for territorial aggrandizement and that its people as a whole will not permit its government, if it would, to take any steps in respect to foreign peoples looking to a forcible extension of our political power.

An arbitration treaty between two great nations of the world would be a very important step in securing the peace of the world. I don't claim any patent for new discovery in that suggestion, because I have no doubt that it has often been made before. If such an arbitration treaty can be concluded I have no doubt that an important step will have been taken, but it will not bring an end of war. It is a step only; and we must not defeat our purposes by enlarging the expectation of the world as to what is to happen and by then disappointing it.

We must realize that we are dealing with a world that is fallible and full of weakness, with somewhat of wickedness in it, and that reforms that are worth having are brought about little by little and not by one blow. I think that we are likely to make more progress if we express our hope with moderation and realize the difficulties that are to be overcome than if we proclaim that we have opened the gate of eternal peace with one key and within one year.

Mr. Andrew Carnegie, who was introduced as "the Dreadnought of peace," spoke just after the President. He said in part:

I rise with diffidence to address the members of our various peace societies here assembled in the presence of the great peace compelling ruler, the bearer of the message from on high, who, through his trumpet with one blast, has blown down the stronghold of international war, which lay in the fallacy that nations could not submit to arbitration questions affecting their honor or vital interests without losing their sovereignty, which only meant, however, their fancied dignity, the truth being that the nation which could not submit any and every question was already bereft of sovereignty, which means power to do what it pleases. When a nation agrees to settle all disputes she possesses her sovereignty.

Now, to President Taft's appeal to the world, in which both his heart and head went forth, for one great nation to join his country in proving their sovereignty by agreeing to submit all disputes to peaceful settlement, behold there came such response across the sea from the other branch of our English-speaking race as had never been made to any appeal before. The leaders of parties in Britain sunk the partisan in the patriot, touched by the President's appeal.

I occupy a strange position; Britain is my motherland, the Republic my wifeland. I love them both, as mother and as wife, and to see my native and adopted lands hand in hand leading the world to peace would add a new charm to my life.

The President was particularly interested in a speech by Dr. J. A. Macdonald, editor of the Toronto (Canada) Globe, a warm advocate of reciprocity. Dr. Macdonald said:

If that arbitration treaty between your country and England is ratified, the name of William Howard Taft will be remembered in world history so long as man loves peace.

Above all other nations Canada has the greatest stake in the proposed treaty; she has the most to gain by peace, the most to lose by war.

Canada desires the pact not for herself alone, but for the sake of the whole world. The time to do it is at hand. The hour is trembling, ready to strike; the tide is swelling to the flood, and if I ever had the right to speak for my country or for the empire to which I belong it is now, and I ask that the Parliament of Great Britain and the Congress of the United States join to insure the peace of the whole world.

Hamilton Holt, the president of the Congress, outlined in his speech at the opening session a peace programme for the world. He said:

First, an unlimited arbitration treaty between Great Britain and the United States; second, a League of Peace; third, the Federation of the World. Those are the successive steps toward achieving the end of wars and the lasting peace of mankind.

Any League of Peace likely to be established in the immediate future must differ from all previous and present leagues, alliances and confederations in its total abstinence from the use of force.

First, the nations in the league shall refer all disputes of whatsoever nature to arbitration. Second, The Hague Court or other duly constituted courts shall decide all disputes that cannot be settled by diplomacy. Third, the league shall provide a periodical convention or assembly to make all rules for the league, such rules to become law unless vetoed by a nation within a stated period. Fourth, each member of the league shall have the right to withdraw on due notice.

Mr. James Speyer, who, as a delegate from the Chamber of Commerce of New York State, spoke on "International Finance as a Power for Peace," said just before closing:

We in the United States are proud of being called a business people. Uninterrupted peace is of more importance to business than tariff reform, free trade or currency reform, or even reciprocity with Canada. It is a business question, and we business men of the United States should insist on international agreements making for peace.

A medal, which was awarded to Mr. Carnegie by the twenty-one nations forming the Pan-American Union that convened at Buenos Ayres, Argentina, last summer, was presented during the Congress. The medal is of gold and is three and one-half inches in diameter. Upon its face is a bas relief portrait of Mr. Carnegie, with the words: "Benefactor of humanity." The reverse side bears the inscription: "The American Republics to Andrew Carnegie, 1911."

The blessed Lawd done sent yo' de birds and the but-rflies, de wild flowers and de wind, to ay with now." I once knew a little rl in Japan, who in May packed her ys in a teakwood box and asked her ama to send them to some "winter-nd little girl," for she was ready to ay with the sunshine and the cherry ossoms. In the south of France, the ildren have May parties and picnics r their dolls. I have seen as any as two hundred dollies ily decked with flowers and ibbons on a single village reen.

May in Southern Lands

MAY on the Mediterranean in Italy and Spain is wonderful too. Myriads of little folk ubble out into the sunshine ike so many fairies dancing verywhere. And when the ong soft twilights come the hildren seem scarcely to "turn n" and go to bed as American oys and girls do. They play ut until it is quite dark, and hen—well, perhaps they do go o bed, but it seems more as hough they just vanished, by ome magic spell, into the mar-le palaces that are everywhere n Southern Europe. And at un-up there they all are at lay again. In Italy especially ne wonders if the king is not n enchanted king, who plans with the sun to make his chil-ren happy.

PEACE DAY

"God shall spread abroad His banner, Sign of universal peace."

IT IS interesting to know that the first motto for the original American flag, made by Betsy Ross in the quaint little upholstery shop in Arch Street, Philadelphia, is this: "An Appeal to Heaven." And in these days, when the battle cry of nations is "Peace on earth, good will to men," it comes as a delightful surprise to rediscover that Old Glory has already been recognized as a Peace banner.

After the surrender of Cornwallis at Yorktown, there were flag raisings far and wide over the original States to celebrate the end of the war. Every American banner then in existence was run up to herald and commemorate the return of Peace, and during the years that followed, when the trading vessels of the young Republic sailed the seas and entered the principal ports carrying the Stars and Stripes, Old Glory became known generally as the Flag of Peace.

Every loyal American should consider it his individual duty to talk Peace, to live Peace, and to celebrate the return of each Peace anniversary. With such a spirit broadcast over our country, great things can be accomplished.

A PRETTY PENNY TRICK

INERTIA, or that tendency of a body to remain at rest until acted upon by some force, is nicely shown by the following experiment: Balance an ordinary stiff calling card upon your index finger; now place a small coin, such as a cent piece, in the middle of the card, directly over the end of your finger. With the thumb and middle finger of the other hand (see illustration) snap the edge of the card sharply. If the card is snapped away in the plane in which it was at rest—that is, without going either up or down—you will find the coin nicely balanced on your finger tip. Very little practice will enable you to snap the card out straight every time.

"Snap the card sharply"

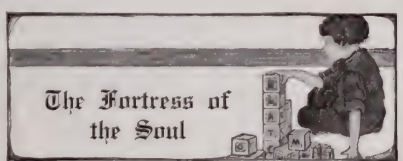
The card did not have time to impart its motion to the coin, or in other words, the coin's inertia kept it where it was.

A Sacred Parchment

THE most interesting document in America to-day, if not in the world, is beyond a doubt the Declaration of American Independence.

"It stands and must forever stand alone, a beacon on the summit of the mountain to which all the inhabitants of the earth may turn their eyes for a genial and saving light, till time shall be lost in eternity, and this globe itself dissolve, nor leave a wrack behind."

COZY CORNER boys and girls were so beautifully enthusiastic over the splendid Old Glories that were sent to them from the Cozy Corner in April, that it is with great pleasure I am announcing that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Old Glories may still be had. (See page 514 of this issue).



Complimentary copies of the Declaration of Independence have been forwarded to the hundreds of boys and girls who sent for Old Glory in April.

Good-Night Verse

Blessed are the peacemakers; for they shall be called the children of God.

The Fortress of the Soul

Ah, little son of mine!
The scoldings, if you knew,
Are but to build a fortress great
Within that soul of you.
Dear little son of mine,
It must be rock, not sand;
And every word a battlement
To make it stronger stand.
We'll call this citadel we build
The Fortress of the Soul.
The general is Courage and
The captain is Control.
The raw recruits are all your deeds
Awaiting to enroll.
Come, get your blocks; a wall we'll make
About the mimic square;
A toy battalion we will use
In painted jackets there.
The countersign will be a smile,
And "Taps" will be a prayer;
The sentry brave is steadfast Truth,
The gateman Constant Care.
And every soldier must be picked
To guard the fortress fair.
Begin to-day to form each squad;
The troops are in your hand;
And show yourself an officer
That's worthy a command.

THE 448 ACTUAL PHOTOGRAPHS
Realizing how much easier it would be to appreciate the Bible if everyone could visit the Holy Lands and see for themselves the places and scenes of Bible history, the Society equipped a special Expedition at a cost of $25,000 to tour Bible Lands and to secure actual photographs of all the places made sacred by the foot steps of Christ and the great events of Bible history. The result is a truly priceless collection of 448 wonderful Biblical and historical photographs, by means of which the Society now brings Bible Lands to us in our own homes.

Husbands and Fathers

IN THE division of labor which assigns to wife and mother the indoor management of home and its concerns, it is supposed that the man of the house will look after as his share most of the outdoor work. For instance, it is his duty to order the coal, take care of the furnace, shovel the snow, and relieve the wife of everything that requires a strong arm and a strong back. Notwithstanding that a man may work hard all day in the field, the shop, the office, the foundry, or wherever his business takes him, he does not fulfil the obligations of a good husband in this land of ours if he permits his wife to carry coal from the cellar or do any other household work that demands mere strength. American men are chivalrous, and they scorn the idea of being waited on by their women folk. All the more they should be considered and perhaps petted and indulged in their preferences in the life of the household. Children should be taught to wait upon fathers as well as upon mothers, and if a husband have a favorite dish it should be ready for him when he sits down to his evening meal. What the home would be without the presence of and the cheer brought to it by the good husband and the loving father, who can tell? There are some who measure by their sorrow the depth of such a lack.

"To Jesus in Heaven"

A LETTER addressed in a childish hand was thus deposited in a post office in Pennsylvania not long ago. A little girl whose sister had been rescued from drowning, wrote her thanks from the fulness of her heart and then dropped the missive in the box. She did not know that Jesus can be reached by methods less clumsy than those of our earthly life. She felt that she was doing him honor when she sent her little confident letter, and so indeed she was. There may be world-hardened hearts which the little incident may touch. Jesus is in heaven, but he is also on earth, and he is very near every one of us. We have only to waft our prayers to him and they will be heard. Have you said a word for Jesus Christ this day, this week, this year? Have you written a letter to any one which might lead a soul to him? Ask yourself the question.

What to Do

I FIND outlined in a letter lying on my desk a rather difficult situation. At first I thought I would not make the letter the subject of so much as a paragraph, but as memory recalled one and another confidence given me by friends I changed my mind. Here is the gist of the letter which is my text: A woman is happily married to a man who was a widower when he courted her. When she came home from her wedding journey she found occupying the place of honor in the drawing-room the portrait in oil of her husband's first wife. It gave her a feeling that she had no right in the house; that in a sense she had usurped a position held for years by her predecessor, and notwithstanding her predecessor's death, and the fact that some years had elapsed since then, she could not step into the room without having the eyes of the portrait follow her; and she fancied a look of reproach on the face, which seemed to belong to some one living.

This, however, was not so hard to bear as the fact that on his table in his private den her husband still kept the framed photograph of his first wife. Every day when she dusted this sanctuary and put it in order she was conscious of a sentiment partly composed of jealousy, partly of sadness, and largely of dislike for the picture that stared at her whenever she approached it. What was she to do? Her husband surrounded her with every delicate attention, she knew that she was loved with all his heart, and that he was honestly devoted to her in every thought; yet there were the two pictures. She ventured to ask a married stepdaughter if she would not like to have her mother's picture. The daughter said that she would very much like to have it; that she had asked her father to send it to her before his second marriage, but that he had refused, saying, "That picture has been there a long time, and I would not on any account have it taken from its place. It would not be fair to your mother's memory."

A friend recommended that the drawing-room should be done over, thoroughly refurnished, and that then the portrait should be placed unobtrusively at one side of the room, a little in the shadow. "If you do it, my dear, and say nothing about it, you may depend that your husband will take no notice. If you make a fuss and ask his consent, he will naturally object to allowing a change. As for the photograph on the table upstairs," the friend said, "I think if I were you I would have one of my own taken, frame it beautifully in silver, and present it to your husband on the anniversary of your marriage."

What would the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD do in a case so difficult and delicate as this one? What are the privileges of a second wife, and how far should the honor and reverence that belonged in the first marriage be allowed to interfere with the happiness of the second wife? Are husbands equally as sensitive when the case is reversed? Are there not certain chapters in life under which finis should be written, especially if another page is to be turned? This question is open for discussion. Women and men may write about it as frankly as they please.

One Busy Mother

I AM sure this letter from a busy mother will waken an echo in the experience of a host of others:

"I am the mother of five children, of whom four attend school. I do all my own work, except the washing. My two older girls help on Saturday, and my boy does the errands. I pay the children for their work, and what they earn is their own, although they consult me as to how they shall spend it. During the week they take turns in doing the dishes, which, as everybody knows, is a never-ending task. I was a while ago almost a nervous wreck, much like 'the tired mother' whose letter prompted me to write this one. I still dread the confusion of washing-day, and am relieved when the children are all off to school in the morning. I darn my stockings when friends are calling. Our home duties grow lighter when every one shares the daily responsibility. MRS. D. M."

Is there not somewhere a mother who can add her mite to the solution of this problem of getting the work done, and not getting so tired in the doing that one becomes a wreck?

My pupils are among the most refined, intellectual women of America. They have regained health and good figures and learned how to keep well. Children and Temperance

IT WOULD almost appear that no direct teaching about temperance need be given to children. If they grow up in families where alcoholic liquor is used only medicinally, they have no temptation to stimulants in early life. A sensible German business man of middle age, conversing lately with me on the subject, declared that in his opinion American children were fed on food entirely too stimulating, too highly flavored, and too highly spiced, and that meat was too largely a portion of their diet. He said, "The ordinary American home prepares boys for the saloon." This was his view.

Considering the vast amount of misery due to drunkenness, considering, too, the object lessons presented to the young in the form of human derelicts, we might again suppose that they could go without direct teaching against the drinking of liquor. Unfortunately, our small boys at an early age long to smoke cigarettes. This is their first step toward yielding later on to the temptation to drink. A boy at college or in early business life is sometimes afraid that he will be thought unmanly if he refuses a glass of beer or wine. Far back, unsuspected, there may be an hereditary taint. The first glass taken socially may be the first step on the down-hill road. Parents, teachers, physicians, and, above all, sisters and sweethearts, should set their faces against this perilous vice, and children should be taught that in alcoholic drinks there is a residuum of poison.

Hobble or Harem?

A GREAT deal of nonsense has been set afloat concerning the new woman, as if there ever had been an essential change in the feminine sex from the days of Mother Eve until the present moment. "The eternal feminine" is the term that best describes woman in every age and under every sky. Fashions come and go and revolve in a never-ending circle. Should we penetrate the zenanas of India and the harems of Turkey to-day, we should find many of their inmates amusing their leisure and dissipating their ennui by trying on before their mirrors the gowns of Paris and London. Whoever has read Pierre Loti's vivid descriptions of Oriental life remembers the flashlight he has thrown on the occupations of women in the East behind their guarded doors and latticed windows. Chief among harmless occupations is the trying on of European dress, which the ladies of the harem imagine to be more becoming than their own. It is not strange that among the women of the West there should be a swing of the pendulum in an opposite direction from the fashions which have been in vogue with us, with more or less modification, for many years.

Our girls in the gymnasium and the sensible women who have abandoned the side-saddle in riding on horseback long since adopted a divided skirt in which the ample dimensions and flowing lines were both modest and graceful. How could a girl play basket-ball wearing corset and without freedom to run, catch the ball and exercise her lungs, as well as her limbs, to their utmost capacity?

THE hobble-skirt, which has been worn by extremists in fashion during the past season, was simply the antithesis in absurdity of the voluminous, barrel-shaped skirts which women wore nearly fifty years ago. Open one of your old photograph albums and look at the pictures of the ladies who entertained in Washington during Lincoln's administration, and you will see how the circumference of a skirt dwarfed the figure of the woman within it. The close, clinging hobble-skirt, as it was called, interfered with woman's freedom in walking or running, and on one occasion at least, caused the death of its wearers who lost their lives in a crowd. The poor things, hampered by their skirts, tumbled down and were trampled under foot. The hobble-skirt had far less to say for itself than can be said in behalf of the harem-skirt, in which, at least, a woman can walk with some freedom. It is unlikely that this fashion will be accepted by the better classes of women, or arrive at popular favor anywhere out of its original home. It is simply a vagary of the moment and an interesting feature of the passing show. On the score of indelicacy, it is preferable to the hobble-skirt, and as there is nothing specially masculine about it and it claims notice because it is nondescript and ugly, it will soon be forgotten. A few daring innovators have appeared in it in London, copying their Parisian sisters, and a few more may wear it in New York and Chicago; but it will not come into general use in this country, where the majority of women are conservative, and dress is chosen with a view to suitability and beauty.

A Great Gift to Boston's Children

JOHN H. and Thomas A. Forsythe, two brothers living in Boston, have announced their intention to give to the city a dental infirmary as a memorial to their brothers, James B. and George H. Forsythe. In addition to the building and its perfect equipment, they will endow the institution with $1,000,000. It will be designed specially for the benefit of the children of Boston and vicinity. There will be more than one hundred chairs and the children of the poor will be given treatment free of charge. The Forsythe brothers are of the opinion that diseased teeth are a cause of much ill-health. Their brother James had made plans in his will for a dental infirmary for children. He died suddenly before he had signed the will, and they are now carrying out his wishes. There has always been a tender and beautiful bond of affection between the Forsythe brothers, and they have found great happiness in working and in giving together. They have given away large sums in the quietest way possible, and this last great benefaction also would have been given in secret had it been possible for them to have done so. The dental infirmary for children will add one more splendid institution to what Helen Keller once called the "City of Kind Hearts."

D. A. R.'s New Leader

AFTER a somewhat stormy session, the Daughters of the American Revolution on April 20 re-elected to the position of president-general, Mrs. Matthew T. Scott, who has so ably served in the same office for the past two years. The opposition candidate was the popular Mrs. William Cummings Story of New York. Eleven hundred votes were cast, and the tellers worked until the small hours of the morning in order to determine the result. Mrs. La Verne Noyes of Chicago placed Mrs. Scott's name before the delegates. The nomination was seconded by Mrs. John R. Walker of Kansas City, Mo. There is a strong feeling among some of the leading members of this great and honorable society that when so many able and patriotic women are gathered together, business matters should be transacted as rapidly as is consistent with thoroughness; while the larger share of their time should be devoted to discussions of great political and social questions, since in some of these are involved the prosperity and even the existence of the nation whose heroic birth their organization commemorates.

One Woman's Mission Work

THE Eighth Avenue Mission at 290 Eighth Avenue, New York, is a work of rescue; not primarily, but absolutely and unreservedly; that and only that. The mothers' meetings with nursery and kindergarten connection, the Sunday School, the Bible class, the children's hour, the neighborhood visitation, even to the singing of the Christmas and Easter music, are but side issues. To lose sight for one moment of the important fact that Christ came to seek and to save that which is lost would be to close the Mission doors as far as the present Superintendent, Miss Sara Wray, is concerned. The name Rescue must be true to itself. Miss Wray is not the founder of the Mission, although well known through her valuable association with Colonel Hadley in the St. Bartholomew Mission. Mrs. Mary Agnew Stephens, now of Toronto, eleven years ago opened the doors, but after twelve months handed the work over to Miss Wray.

Miss Sara Wray

No better spot in the City of New York could be chosen for a Mission than the section bordering on the tenderloin, flanked on all sides with cheap shows, gaudy saloons, sensational advertisements, glaring dens of iniquity harboring the initiated and luring the innocent. Decoys of all kinds beckon the young and guileless. Even the children become familiar with vice, thus falling early victims to the sin habit. In the very heart of this district stands the Mission—a lighthouse to steer from the rocks. Here the lifeline is ever thrown out. There are no reproaches made, no questions asked, but the blessed story of the Gospel is simply told, making the way out of darkness, out of sin, so possible, so practical, so exquisitely joyous, that many who come to mock stay to reverence and believe. From the first glimmer of the electric light at sundown until the break of dawn a great mass of humanity roam backward and forward through the street, seeking forgetfulness of self. Not by any means does the crowd represent the luxurious class that fills Broadway with its carriages and motors, well-filled purses, brilliant restaurants and theatres, nor yet the down-and-out, shambling, gaunt-eyed Bowery throng; but a great mass of misled humanity tortured with unrest, seeking big sensations and morbid emotions for little money. Here we find the unchurched—the mechanic, the small merchant, the spiritually indifferent, the wanton, the drunkard, the idler, the reckless, the abandoned.

When the work was established but two or three years it was evident that the quarters were too small. It was a common but always distressing sight to see crowds turned away, to be instantly swallowed up in the adjacent places of questionable amusements. New quarters had to be considered, although buying property or even owning a building was out of the calculation. One day, to the surprise of Miss Wray, she received a ten-dollar gold piece from a convert with the words, "For the new building." Who ever mentioned a new building? Thus God sowed the seed, and the building fund that resulted in the splendid edifice that stands to-day was started.

The Mission is now incorporated under the laws of New York State, with a Board of Directors chosen from the ranks of Christian business men. The building cost forty-one thousand dollars, eight thousand of which have been paid; the rest was taken on a mortgage, thus placing a debt on the building with quarterly interest to meet, also part of the capital to be paid. In addition to this, four thousand dollars were spent in needed repairs. The building was well located but in a deplorable condition—uninhabitable for the workers who intended to make it their permanent home. Everything was done with the most rigid economy. To-day the Mission hall is a cheery sight, well adapted for its work. It is large, well ventilated, ready to accommodate comfortably the increased crowds. Miss Sara Wray, the superintendent, is a most remarkable woman. The first impression she makes in spite of her radiant face is the intensity and self-control of her personality. Slim almost to extreme girlishness, she has the poise and dignity of a soldier—the command of a general. When in repose her face is calm, somewhat sad—a face intent upon a purpose, but relieved by soft masses of bright wavy hair that she wears simply brushed away from her brow. With a most charming winsomeness she combines a masterly leadership that freights her most insignificant words and gestures with meaning and importance. In spite of the mixed throng, including drunkards, maudlin women, flippant girls and scoffing youths, not a sound is heard as she speaks.

Miss Wray has had the most hearty co-operation of her zealous associates, but without exception they are men of limited means and resources.

This extraordinary work is supported entirely by voluntary contributions. Any reader who is interested may address E. G. Selchow, 265 Canal Street, or Miss Sara Wray, 290 Eighth Avenue, New York City.

THE CALL TO SERVICE

AGAIN there comes a cry from o'er the sea;
Again doth China send a mournful plea;
Again she holds to us a trembling hand,
While pain and famine stalk about the land.

Again her cause THE CHRISTIAN HERALD pleads,
And nobly hastes to furnish China's needs;
It sounds a bugle-call to you and me,
To give of our abundance full and free.

It speeds the Buford forth with wheat for bread;
Yet more, much more, is needed, it is said;
For yet do plague and famine hold their sway,
And claim their thousand victims day by day.

O HERALD readers! let us heed the call,
And send our offering, be it great or small;
If but one life should be your offering's yield,
Who shall dare say what good that life may wield?

And with your offering send a fervent prayer,
That Christ may be uplifted everywhere;
That while the hungry mouth with food is fed,
The famished soul may be to Jesus led;

That, while the hand of skill applies the balm,
The lips may breathe the message sweet and calm
Of him, the Great Physician (oh, so blest!):
"Come unto me, and I will give you rest."

Let every one uphold THE HERALD'S hand—
A loyal, stanch, great-hearted Christian band;
In memory of our leader, now in heaven,
Give, every one, as unto you 'tis given.

JENNIE WILSON-HOWELL.

Japan and Korea*

A GREAT Japanese nobleman has said that the highest aim of the patriotic Japanese statesman, teacher or priest is "to develop three qualities in the people—obedience, sympathy and dignity. Obedience, because only through it come regularity and serenity of life; sympathy, because it is the crowning virtue of civilization, without which the best man is but a savage, and because it is the basis of the democracy we hope to become; dignity, because we are an impulsive people, about to meet the outside world on equal terms, and because we need it quite as much in victory as in defeat."

In ministering to the Japanese, our missionaries may well regard this saying. The three traits mentioned are already characteristic of the Japanese people. If only their obedience can be transferred from Confucius and Buddha to Christ, they will surpass in their fealty our own race, in which this virtue has not been so strictly inculcated.

Much fault has been found by the world's people because the numbers of Christians in Japan have not grown in the proportion which might have been expected from the money which has been spent there. It was interesting to hear a returned missionary comment recently upon this matter. He spoke of the respect which is felt there for the missionaries and their teachings; and also of the considerable number of Christian Japanese occupying high places in the Island Empire. But far above any statistical display which can be made is, he asserted, the effect visible on every side in Japan, of the introduction of Christian ideals.

Thus, personal morality there is constantly being adjusted on a higher scale than ever before; plural marriages are decreasing in number and respectability; cruel tortures for crime are being abolished; measures never attempted before are under way for helping the unfortunate classes; women are being educated. In short, Christian standards are gradually superseding those of the old paganism.

In a late issue of the Missionary Herald, Dr. DeForest tells of his recent visit to Korea, which he calls by its Japanese name of "Cho-Sen." He says that that country is full of Japanese Christians, many of them prominent.

Thus the head of the Korean Judiciary, Judge Watanabe, is an earnest Christian. At Songdo the captain of the gendarmes is active in helping the flourishing Methodist mission there. Many of the high officers in the army are Christians. Yet Dr. De Forest says that "the Korean Christianity is not yet related to world-movements and world thought."

Perhaps this is because, though the language of Korea is like that of Japan, its soul, as Mr. Gale says, is Chinese; and this in spite of the fact that they have been ground for ages under the heel of a corrupt government, patterned after the Chinese.

Korea is of about the size of Kansas, and in 1907 was computed to have about 14,000,000 people—every man, woman and child of whom smokes. One of the great tasks of the Korean church leaders and teachers has been the abolition of this custom, which they see to be harmful and extravagant. They put the pipe away "quietly but emphatically," says Mr. Gale.

Korea is crying for missionaries. It receives the Gospel with warmth. In 1900 there were 111,000 adherents to the churches, and the number has greatly increased. But as yet only the outskirts of the land have been reached.

Ready to Run

and Guaranteed to Keep On Running

THE SEARS Nine Models $325.00 to $475.00

SOLD ON TEN DAYS' TRIAL

When your SEARS is uncrated and mounted at the freight depot you have only to fill the gasoline tank, climb into the seat and drive off—as soon as your friends will let you go, for motor enthusiasts everywhere gather about a newly arrived SEARS to admire its power plant and praise its perfect construction and natty appearance.

The SEARS is first, last and all the time a country car. In designing and building it we deliberately forgot that there are such things as boulevards and rock roads. That is why, day after day, all the year 'round, this car is found doing hill climbing and other "stunts" more difficult than are attempted by high priced automobiles in much talked of endurance tests and economy trials.

The judgment of careful buyers is not influenced by the performances of expensive cars run by star drivers and mechanicians in endurance and cross country races, with repair parts awaiting the cars at almost every stop.

The SEARS' remarkable records for endurance, reliability and economy are the more wonderful because they have been made by self-taught amateur motorists whose only knowledge of motoring was gained from our instruction book. We employ no racing experts and no demonstrators, but hire the best engineering and mechanical talent obtainable to build the SEARS and keep it right.

What the SEARS does, how it does it and at what cost—everything you want to know about the car and how you can make it work for you, is told in letters from SEARS owners which we have printed in a booklet entitled "What Sears Owners Say." Let us send you a free copy NOW.

FEED YOUNG GIRLS

Must Have Right Food While Growing.

Great care should be taken at the critical period when the young girl is just merging into womanhood that the diet shall contain that which is upbuilding and nothing harmful.

At that age the structure is being formed and if formed of a healthy, sturdy character, health and happiness will follow; on the other hand unhealthy cells may be built in and a sick condition slowly supervene which, if not checked, may ripen into a chronic condition and cause life-long suffering.

A young lady says:

"Coffee began to have such an effect on my stomach a few years ago that I finally quit using it. It brought on headaches, pains in my muscles, and nervousness.

"I tried to use tea in its stead, but found its effects even worse than those I suffered from coffee. Then for a long time I drank milk at my meals, but at last it palled on me. A friend came to the rescue with the suggestion that I try Postum.

"I did so, only to find at first, that I didn't fancy it. But I had heard of so many persons who had been benefited by its use that I persevered, and when I had it made right—according to directions on the package—I found it grateful in flavor and soothing and strengthening to my stomach. I can find no words to express my feeling of what I owe to Postum!

"In every respect it has worked a wonderful improvement—the headaches, nervousness, the pains in my side and back, all the distressing symptoms yielded to the magic power of Postum. My brain seems also to share in the betterment of my physical condition; it seens keener, more alert and brighter. I am, in short, in better health now than for a long while before, and I am sure I owe it to the use of your Postum." Name given by Postum Company, Battle Creek, Mich.

"There's a Reason."

Ever read the above letter ?A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true, and full of human interest.

The Proof of Faith*

THERE is no stronger argument for unity among Christians than those loving words of the apostle James, which form our first text this week. Every sect and every creed which our America knows, agree that "if a brother or sister be destitute," it is a travesty on any sort of religion to say to him or her, "Depart in peace," until that destitution has been relieved. Every evangelical and other so-called Christian sect, all Roman Catholics, all Jews, meet on this common platform. We may disagree in our conceptions of the atonement, of baptism, of the oral confession of sin, even of the past or future coming of Christ, and yet we all believe that the proof of any sort of honest religion is helpfulness and service to our fellow-beings. Is it not a beautiful thought?

In the same way, all religious sects unite in a hatred of sin. All deplore the existence of the low saloons and dens of vice in our towns and cities; all desire a purer family life, and a higher condition of physical, mental and moral health throughout the world. All the streams of religious thought, no matter how widely they may seem to be separated by creeds or forms, thus, as it were, meet together in the boundless ocean of God's love for his poor, misguided creatures.

"But," you may say, "I can't do anything for the so-called poor. I am poor myself. I have all I can do to keep myself fairly comfortable and free from debt. I can't help others."

It is true that there are some among us who do not solicit nor wish others to assist them, yet who are still as badly off as some of those to whom alms are extended; but the great mass of self-supporting people can manage, if they so desire, to save something from their scanty living to alleviate the lot of those who are less fortunate.

The sainted Dr. George Parsons Nichols once appealed to his people to repair their church. It was at a time of financial stringency throughout the country, and he knew that the work could not be done without much self-denial on the part of his congregation. "But," said he, "I want you to make sacrifices. I could wish that this whole church were frescoed with sacrifices. I could wish that every window through which God's light streams in were a sacrifice-window, and that every sacred object upon which the light falls were a gift of sacrifice."

We may say without reserve that the teachings of Scripture impress the same lesson. (See Luke 21: 2-4; Matt. 16: 24; and many other passages.) We are continually admonished in the sacred writings that, whatever our condition in life, nothing absolves us from the obligation to show our faith by good and unselfish deeds, and especially by helping others in the giving of our substance and of ourselves. Among the very poor, this spirit often prevails to a remarkable extent. Many touching stories are told of the Christ-like self-denial for others among those whom we are wont to regard as degraded and ignorant.

"The love of our neighbor," said George Macdonald, "is the only door out of the dungeon of self."

And the same thought was sweetly expressed by Rose Terry Cooke in these noble lines:

Pour out thy love like the rush of a river
Wasting its waters, forever and ever,
Through the burnt sands that reward not the giver.
Silent or songful, thou nearest the sea.
Scatter thy life as the summer showers pouring.
What if no bird through the pearl-rain is soaring?
What if no blossom looks upward adoring?
Look to the Life that was lavished for thee!

Motion Picture Exhibits Under Our Plan Will Arouse Interest And Provide Permanent Income

No Pay Until After Service Is Rendered

IN past years the Motion Picture Machine has not been widely used by Church organizations because of the almost prohibitive price that has been asked and the lack of suitable material for educational and religious purposes.

Even the smallest mission church can now own and operate its own Motion Picture Apparatus and give entertainments as frequently as desired.

We furnish a very large assortment of programs and keep you advised of every new picture.

The charges for our services are paid out of your receipts after the entertainment has been given. No advance charges.

Motion Picture Machines, Stereopticons, Films and all supplies are sold by us at prices far below the ordinary and we make a specialty of the machines best suited for church work.

What an Eager Rush!

CHRISTIAN HERALD families are eagerly accepting our limited offer of the big World-Wide Encyclopedia for about one-tenth the lowest price of other big Encyclopedias. It is making them wonder. How in the world can such an offer be made?—and only $1.00 down and $1.00 a month to pay!

Don't try to understand it. It is a modern business miracle. We are somewhat excited over it ourselves. But it is true—that's enough.

We Are Shipping Them Out by Hundreds

The wise ones are getting their acceptances in to us in a hurry, to make sure of being among the happy 4020. Too bad we shall have to stop at 4020! We should love to give all CHRISTIAN HERALD families the same pleasure and profit that will come to those who are fortunate enough to get one of these 4020 sets.

The trouble with such an unusual bargain is that it can't be for everybody. However, if you don't wait too long, you may secure a set before they're gone. Don't procrastinate.

Never Mind the Big Prices of Other Encyclopedias Save 90 Per Cent. of Your Money!

To CHRISTIAN HERALD READERS:

The barrier of price has been broken down! The need of a great, complete, reliable and usable Encyclopedia in the family may be met at once almost without cost.

Instead of offering you somebody's American or British hundred-dollar Encyclopedia, which perhaps you can not afford to buy, and which you might be afraid to use if you had it, we have rubbed Aladdin's lamp, and will place in your home the great 12-volume World-Wide Encyclopedia for just about one-tenth the lowest price of other big Encyclopedias—and only $1.00 to pay now.

We can't let every CHRISTIAN HERALD family have this remarkable bargain. Sorry, but we are compelled to limit the number to 4020 sets. Those who get their orders in first will have these sets at the surprisingly little price of $11.75 each—$1.00 with order and $1.00 a month thereafter. (The regular price for the cheapest binding would be $30.00.)

The World-Wide Encyclopedia contains the important facts of all knowledge, from the earliest times of the world up to President Taft's administration. It sweeps every field of human enterprise, faithfully records all recent discoveries, traces the mental and moral development of the race, the growth of nations, their governments and their commerce and manufacture. It is a rich treasure-store of History, Geography, Industry, Science, Art, Biography and Literature. It is a sure authority on all subjects, and has the imprint and endorsement of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD as a guarantee of a superior excellence and complete reliability.

The World-Wide Encyclopedia is in 12 large octavo volumes, containing 9807 pages and 96 maps. It is durably bound in heavy silk-finished cloth, with gold stamps. The set stands 9 inches high and fills 26 inches of shelf space.

The fact that only $1.00 need be paid before the entire set is shipped, and then only $1.00 a month, makes it possible for families that really need a complete, reliable Encyclopedia, but cannot spend a fortune for one, to get possession at once of this splendid World-Wide Encyclopedia.

We fully guarantee every set. If you are not entirely pleased in every particular, you may return the Encyclopedia within ten days and get your money back.

Really, this is a wonderful bargain. We are glad of the chance to give CHRISTIAN HERALD subscribers such a valuable Encyclopedia and save them so much money. We wish we could supply every family on our list, but this time we are compelled to limit the offer to 4020 sets at so great a discount.

Send at once this Coupon with the first $1.00, and the World-Wide Encyclopedia will be boxed and shipped to you promptly, freight charges payable at your end.

The Judson Centenary

THE one hundredth anniversary of Baptist Missionary operations in Burma is approaching. Eighteen members of the Centennial Commission of one hundred met at Rochester March 18 to consider plans for the proper observance of the centennial of American Baptist Foreign Missions. Dr. A. H. Strong, President of the Theological Seminary at Rochester, was elected chairman of the Commission, and Rev. S. R. Warburton of

Adoniram Judson

Boston, recording secretary. At the evening session, Secretary F. P. Haggard of the American Baptist Foreign Mission Society presented plans for the centennial, and Rev. Dr. Edward Judson, son of Adoniram Judson, made an address in which he dwelt on those qualities of his father's character which had made his influence enduring. Rev. B. L. Whitman of Seattle and Rev. H. E. Fosdick of Montclair, N. J., also made addresses. There will be a campaign of education touching upon the history, the needs and results of Foreign Missions, as outlined by the Baptists. The climax of these centennial anniversaries will be in May, 1914, and Boston may be the place of meeting. Pilgrimages from that centre to Andover, Salem, Plymouth and Malden, places connected with the name of Judson and Baptist Foreign Missions, will be made. It is now nearly a century since Judson and his first wife, Ann Hasseltine, with Luther Rice, started for Burma as missionaries of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions. They became Baptists upon arrival in India, and this led to a great arousing of the Baptist denomination in America to support them as foreign missionaries, and led to the organization of the American Baptist Foreign Mission Society, which has endeavored for nearly a century to carry the Gospel through its missionaries to all the peoples of the world. Rev. Ezra T. Sanford of the North Baptist Church of New York recently preached an illustrated sermon on "Jesus Christ's man," using a large tapestry representing Judson on a furlough in 1846.

How Cy Started Something

By ANN HYNSON

ONE warm afternoon, when a nap seemed the most desirable thing on earth, a defiant "Ma-a-a!" was heard from our back yard. A hasty descent was made, to find "Cy," our eleven-year-old, being pulled around by a rope at the motive end of which was a most belligerent and positive calf; while a grinning and appreciative audience filled the rest of the yard.

"What in the world, Cy, are you doing with that calf?" came from the astonished spectator. Between jerks he managed to gasp out, "Say, ma, do you think pa'll let me keep it? Got it from Mr. Jamison for a dollar. I c'n keep it in the cellar, easy."

The maternal confidante and counselor, anathematizing our friendly neighbor, firmly but gently announced her belief that father would be obdurate as to keeping the calf at all. Cy's face fell, but in a moment he brightened up. "Well, I wish't he would. But say! Where's this calf going to, anyway?" Away they went at a planter's pace all over the back yard, bringing up at a tree, which the calf proceeded to encircle, and being tightly wound up, perforce stood still at last.

This was the beginning of Cy's solution of the pet problem for himself and his brothers. A neighbor's barn family had lately been increased by the arrival of a new little calf. Cy and his brothers were thrillingly interested, and always on hand at milking time, or any other moment when the barn door stood open.

Cy's soul longed for that calf. All his talk was about it. Couldn't we buy it for him? We demonstrated the difficulty of caring for it, but Cy could see no obstacles. Becoming desperate, he finally resolved to take the law in his own hands, emptied the contents of his tin savings bank, inveigled our worthy neighbor into a business transaction, and hence the scene then being enacted in our back yard. Cy wiped his little red face with his sleeve and earnestly recommenced the argument. "Now, look here, ma, if pa won't let me keep it here, I can sell it to the University farm for five dollars. Sam Stehr says so, and then I can buy a pony; besides, I c'n play with the calf all afternoon." A pony! The mother fairly gasped.

The audience approved of the sale, having visions at once of treats ad libitum, and shouted in chorus, "We'll go along and help you, Cy. Come on, kids!"

Mothers are proverbially sympathetic (we won't say weak); so an agreement was entered into that, whatever was done, the calf was to be off the premises before father's return. The poor animal, by this time grown thirsty from its exercise, was making the welkin ring with its demands for a drink, and as he was securely tied to the tree, Cy left him in charge of Stub Jones, and went for milk. After the calf had consumed a considerable portion of the supply of milk for supper, Cy returned to his struggles to tame the calf, who refused to play, or to be played with, but butted violently at him when petted, and firmly planted himself instead of following his loving master.

At last Cy was reminded of his agreement by the clock indoors loudly striking five. The calf must go. So the procession formed, Cy and his protégé leading the way, his coadjutors rushing after him. But they did not rush far. Suddenly the calf decided not to leave home, and utterly refused to stir. Cy pulled, and the boys pushed. Mount Hermon on its base was not more firmly rooted than that animal. The day was hot. All were in a perspiring condition, but the calf, who was fresh as a daisy. What to do? Just then, as if sent by a good fairy, along drove Mr. Daley, the good-natured groceryman.

"What you trying to do, boys?"

"Oh, Mr. Daley," chorused the boys, "we want to go to the University farm with the calf; won't you take us? Are you going that way?"

Mr. Daley laughed all over his fat, jovial Irish face. "Well, I don't know but I might. What you going to do when you get him there?"

A united shout from the boys: "Sell him for five dollars." And Cy diplomatically added, "I'll give you fifty cents of it, Mr. Daley, if you'll take me'n the calf."

"Humph," said Mr. Daley, scratching his head, "don't believe they'll ever give you no five dollars for that calf; 'tain't more'n three weeks old. Well, let's see, hoist him up."

After many bunts and rushes on the part of the calf, and much lifting by the amiable Irishman, the calf was at last placed in the wagon, Cy and half a dozen boys mounting guard beside it, the rest of the crowd hanging on behind; and so they disappeared from view, leaving many misgivings with the watcher on the porch.

Supper passed, and no Cy. The sun sank below the horizon, still no sign of the missing boys. Darkness deepened, and the stars shone out; mother was getting very nervous and father commencing to pace the porch. A little figure came running through the gloom, the ever faithful Hi. "Cy can't get the calf to go," he panted. "It's tied to a tree now, and Cy says he's going to stay, and sleep by it all night."

Now that the facts were known, and Cy safely located, father's wrath broke forth anew. "Pretty piece of business. The most foolish thing I ever heard of a sane person doing, allowing a boy to buy a calf."

Finally, when a sound very like a smothered laugh came from the dark corner of the porch, father, with a grunt of disgust and indignation, put on his hat and stalked off in the direction of the hill, whence a sound had been proceeding for some time, the plaintive "ma-a-a!" of a hungry calf, responded to every time by the lowing of the mother cow in the vacant lot near by. Half an hour passed away. The watcher on the porch, divided in sympathy for the long-suffering man and the downcast boy, listening intently to all sounds from the hill, noticed that they seemed to be moving and coming nearer, but very slowly. What could the poor souls be doing? At last, about ten P.M., a very weary and exasperated man, with a humble and despondent boy trudging behind him, appeared through the darkness, and sank down on the porch steps. Poor father had carried that calf every step of the way home!

After the calf incident there was a lull in the live stock demand among our boys. However, one morning Cy came running in, his big black eyes shining. "Now I've got something that I know papa will let me keep," he announced, proudly uncovering a basket, and displaying two lively Plymouth Rock pullets, gift of the kind-hearted neighbor. "I c'n keep them in our play-house, and they'll lay eggs; then you can always have fresh eggs, mamma." There was no resisting this appeal, no objections to be raised; so the two pullets were located in the play-house, where they lived in great comfort for two days, and were objects of the deepest interest to the neighborhood children, who thronged the ex-play-house to watch Cy's fowls.

After the second day he again appeared before his confidante, with rather an apologetic manner. "I've taken those pullets back to Mr. Jamison, mamma, and he's let me have a good hen that lays every day; those pullets wouldn't ever lay." Mother agreed that was a better bargain; so the hen now occupied the pullets' former domicile, and a box of straw, containing mother's darner, was placed invitingly in a corner, Cy retiring to await developments. That hen was vigilantly watched through a knot hole by Cy, Stub Jones and Hi, in turns throughout the afternoon, but though she inspected the entire residence, not an egg did she lay, and seemed not to notice the attractive nest. When five o'clock came the boys gave up for that day, because Mr. Jamison had told them hens did not usually lay after four o'clock. Next morning, though, as Cy was dressing for breakfast, his ears were charmed by the sound of a loud, victorious cackle from the poultry house; out he raced in his stocking feet, regardless of dewy grass, to return proudly, bearing the first product of his poultry establishment.

In three days this industrious Biddy laid as many eggs and Cy proudly boasted of his hen to all whom he could get to listen. Then came a change. Two of Mr. Jamison's hens came off their nests, followed by a flock of downy chicks. This was the most wonderful event that had happened in boy-land for some time; and our hen's glories paled before such interesting creatures as a hen and her family of snowy puff-balls.

Finally Cy was seen in the barn in earnest conversation with the unfailingly complaisant Mr. Jamison. Emerging from the barn door, he came over to the porch where mother sat darning stockings. With a somewhat sheepish look, he said, "Mamma, I've decided to trade my hen for a setter. Mr. Jamison will let me have a nice old Plymouth Rock setting-hen. You ought to just see her; she ruffles all her feathers when I smooth her, and says, "Cluck, cluck!" but she don't peck a bit. Then I'll empty my savings bank—it's half full again—and get some first-class eggs and set her on them; then when they hatch I'll have a real poultry yard, and we'll have all the eggs we want, and chickens for dinner." This was counting chickens before they were hatched certainly.

The hen was duly installed in the nest on some "first-class eggs," "Buff Cochin, biggest chicken that grows," according to Cy. Old Mrs. Plymouth tucked them carefully under her, and all went well for two hours. But the knot-hole could not have been carefully attended, for at the close of an exciting game of ball, Cy and Hi came tearing in, the tears making pathways down their dirty little faces. "Oh, mamma, the old hen has knocked all her eggs out, and they're broken on the floor; now we can't have a poultry yard." Poor boys! the case was indeed desperate. Old Biddy was seated with Buddha-like gravity on one egg, while fourteen others lay like sacrifices before her shrine. The boys had turned the former nest on its side, without a protecting board in front, so when Mrs. Hen got off to take an airing, out went all the "first-class eggs."

The only thing to do now was to replace them with next best, which were eggs that had lain in the ice-box for two days; they were, however, warmed in the oven, and then the patient old dame was placed on her new batch, well boarded in this time. Contrary to all expectations, five of those eggs hatched, notwithstanding that the store, the ice-box and the oven had a hand in controlling their fertility. When those five chicks of all kinds and colors followed their proud mother on a hunt for the choicest bugs, the joy of Cy and Hi knew no bounds.

"They're mine, my very own, I hatched 'em!" their happy owner cried over and over again; and loyal Hi, with equal pride in whatever Cy delighted in, shouted with joy, "Aren't you glad, mamma, aren't you glad?" throwing his arms around her neck, while Cy danced a triumphant war dance, and the rest of the clan perched on the porch rail, and whooped.

"Mamma 's Making Jell-O"

"Bobbie! Bobbie-e-e! Mamma 's making Jell-O! Ain't you gla-a-d?"

Bobbie certainly is glad. Mamma lets him have two or three "helps" of Jell-O sometimes, because it is so good—and never a stomachache afterwards.

Do you remember how awful it used to be when you found there was nothing good under way for dinner?

JELL-O

was unknown then, and you had pie or pudding usually, when you had any dessert at all. Now the child who doesn't get Jell-O is deprived of one of the fine things of present-day life.

Sanatogen
THE FOOD-TONIC

Upbuilder of Nerves and Vitality

Late King Edward's Physician

Dr. Ernst Ott, Marienbad: "I have been using Sanatogen for a number of years with excellent results. These results have been notably good in the case of elderly people when it was desirable to build up the strength, to stimulate the bodily functions and to improve the circulation of the blood."

The Czar of Russia's Private Physician

Dr. Forchmin: "My daughter, who was very nervous and anæmic, has been greatly benefited by the prolonged use of Sanatogen. Her appetite improved, her weight increased and the color of her skin became healthier."

The King of Italy's Private Physician

Dr. G. Quirico: "I have used Sanatogen with marked benefit in the case of weakly children and in convalescence after long illness. I consider Sanatogen a most excellent tonic food."

Emperor of Austria's Private Physician

Surgeon-General Dr. Kreyl of Vienna: "I have been using Sanatogen with splendid results and recommend it continually and everywhere because I am thoroughly convinced that it is an excellent food-tonic."

Emperor Frederick's Physician

Professor Tobold, M.D.: "My experience points to the fact that patients suffering from nervous exhaustion and who commence the troublesome symptoms of neurasthenia by using Sanatogen, in a comparatively short time regain strength and vitality."

ARE you one of the countless men and women who have fallen victims to poor nerves, exhausted strength, weak digestion?

Are you one of those who have tried "tonic" after "tonic" with little or no benefit?

Then this page is written for you; it is your duty to heed a message so vitally important.

Sanatogen presents to you its record of achievement; you cannot afford to ignore it.

Read the letters reprinted on this page. They are from men whose fame and authority as physicians are world-wide.

You may not be able to consult them personally, but here is their answer to your question: How can I revitalize my overwrought nervous system? The answer is: Sanatogen.

Fifteen thousand physicians the world over have written in a similar strain, everyone of them endorsing the remarkable value of Sanatogen as a rebuilder of weak nerves and run-down bodies. Their attitude toward Sanatogen is summed up by Surgeon-General Professor Tillmanns when he writes: "I am and shall always remain a great admirer of Sanatogen."

They cannot help admiring Sanatogen, for every day they see evidence of its splendid power to infuse strength and resistive force into a nervous system weakened by overwork, worry or disease, of its remarkable capacity to regenerate digestion or assimilation.

Sanatogen is able to produce such results because it is the product of scientific research, designed expressly to meet the demands of a starved nervous system.

To quote Professor Thos. B. Stillman, the well-known research chemist:

> "The chemical union of the constituents is a true one, representative of the highest skill in the formation of a product containing phosphorus in the organic condition and so combined with albumen that the digestion and assimilation of Sanatogen is rendered complete, with the greatest ease."

Every day, in every land, thousands upon thousands of people find in Sanatogen a wonderful source of strength and vitality. Famous men and women, statesmen, prelates, authors, etc., have unreservedly endorsed it. The portraits of only a few of these celebrities are shown on this page.

Can you afford to leave Sanatogen untried? Is it not a duty you owe to yourself, to your family and your friends, to grasp the helping hand of Sanatogen? Buy the first box to-day, but in any case—a beautiful little book written by a prominent physician-author who explains in a popular yet authoritative way the exact relation of your nervous system to your general well-being, physical and mental. You will profit by reading this captivating treatise, which we will send you with our compliments.

Write for "Our Nerves of To-morrow"

Sanatogen is sold in three sizes: $1.00, $1.90, $3.60

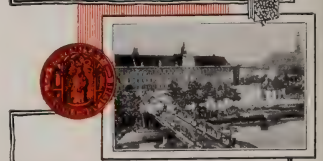
Surgeon-General Prof. Dr. Tillmanns, Leipsic University, says:

"I am, and shall always be a great admirer of Sanatogen."

Professor C. von Noorden, of Vienna University, writes:

"Sanatogen is of especial value in the various forms of anæmia and general debility. It is an excellent albuminous preparation."



Prof. Dr. C. A. Ewald, of Berlin University, says:

"I am able to speak from my own observations made at the bedside of patients, and I can say that I have used Sanatogen in a great number of cases that is, in those disturbances of metabolism which were mainly of a nervous or neurasthenic origin and have obtained excellent results."

Prof. Dr. Binswanger, of Jena University, writes:

"We have had good results from the use of Sanatogen in our clinic."

Professor Dr. Albert Neisser, Breslau University, writes:

"The experiments that I have thus far made with Sanatogen, especially in cases of patients suffering from loss of appetite and neurasthenia, have been most satisfactory."

Questions and Answers

Miss M. F., Detroit, Mich. What is meant by "the special friends of Jesus"? A Bible class teacher used these words: "Jesus has his friends, to whom he trusts his secrets more than to others."

Lazarus and his sisters, Mary and Martha, may be regarded as special friends, and John was known as "the beloved disciple." To what extent Jesus made special revelations to them concerning himself and his mission, must be left to conjecture. The teacher may have intended a modern application, however, meaning that those who were most thoroughly consecrated to Christ, or who lived most closely to him, were, more largely than others, partakers of his nature and knew better the mind of the Master.

L. M. L. What do you consider among the leading vices, social, political, etc., of our time which threaten in any degree the destruction of our civilization?

Among our besetting sins as a people are corruption in high places, the inordinate love of money, the pursuit of pleasure, intemperance, the neglect of high ideals, social impurity and the lack of an honest enforcement of the laws. We do not take the pessimistic view, however, that conditions are such as to threaten the destruction of our civilization. We believe our country has a grand future in the drama of world development and that, under divine guidance, its greatest days have yet to come.

B. F. W., Cleveland, Okla. Please explain I. John 3: 9. Also Heb. 6: 4, 5, and 6.

The passage I. John 3: 9 is interpreted as meaning that the seed—the Living Word of God made by the Holy Spirit the seed of new life in the heart—is a continuous means of sanctification and keeps us from sin. Thus, the thoroughly regenerate, while they may be involuntarily betrayed into sin by the old nature, are cleansed of their sin by the blood of Christ. The passage does not say that because a man was once born of God, he never afterwards can sin; but with the Living Word now abiding in him, sin can have no place where it so abides. It was Luther who put the case pointedly when he said, "The child of God in this conflict receives wounds daily, but never throws away his arms nor makes peace with the deadly foe."

E. N. L., Cromwell, Conn. Where is the quotation found, "He tempereth the wind to the shorn lamb"?

In Laurence Sterne's Sentimental Journey.

N. C. P., Santa Barbara, Calif. Please harmonize Matthew's and Luke's account of Christ's first days. Matthew says that he was taken to Egypt and remained there until the death of Herod, while Luke says he was taken to Nazareth.

There is no discrepancy between the accounts of the two evangelists. Luke, it is true, does not give the episode of the journey to Egypt; but a close reading of chapter 2: 39 to 42 inclusive, shows that the evangelist has purposely omitted, for the sake of brevity, the details which would ordinarily cover a period of years. The whole account of Luke is less circumstantial than that of Matthew. A very generous construction as regards the lapse of time might be put on the three verses in question, which cover a period of twelve years. The two narratives, though independent, are easily reconciled.

Maria B., Schenectady, N. Y. Being somewhat tenderhearted toward those in distress, I am frequently warned by friends—well-meaning ones, no doubt—against "indiscriminate charity." But what can one do? It is often difficult and sometimes impossible to tell the worthy from the undeserving.

Yours is not an uncommon experience. If we could look into the heart (which the good Book tells us "God alone knoweth"), we might be able to learn the merits or demerits of cases. But as this is impossible, save in an occasional case we think the right course is to give the applicant the benefit of the doubt. It would be better to feed a few rascals than that one worthy man or woman should be misjudged and starved by any act of ours.

Reader, Pottsville, Ark. What States and countries have woman suffrage, and what good has it done there?

Colorado, Idaho, Wyoming, Utah and Washington are the States which allow men and women to vote on equal terms. Australia, New Zealand, Norway, Finland and (practically) Denmark have woman suffrage. From all these countries come favorable reports of its results. Mrs. Julia Ward Howe sent just before her death circular letters to Episcopal, Baptist, Methodist, Presbyterian and Congregational ministers and also to editors in the enfranchised States asking whether the results of the woman's ballot there were bad or good. Six hundred and twenty-four answers were received: 62 opposed, 46 in doubt, 516 in favor.

D. W., Easton, Pa. Why did Jesus, after eating the Passover, exhorting his disciples, washing their feet, singing a hymn and offering a prayer, resort with his disciples to the Mount of Olives and Gethsemane, when it must have been late and cold, instead of seeking a needed night's rest at some friendly abode?

It was no time for rest; he knew that his hour was at hand (see Matt. 26: 31 and subsequent verses). He went to the garden to pray and to receive new spiritual strength for the great trial which was about to come upon him. An angel ministered unto him and strengthened him (Luke 22: 43). With divine omniscience he knew what had passed in the mind of Judas and that his own betrayal was near. Yet even in the crisis, had he so desired, he might have summoned the heavenly forces to overthrow the machinations of sin (see Matt. 26: 53, 54). We think that Matt. 26, read carefully, furnishes the whole answer to the question.

T. H. C., Cresco, Pa. Please explain what it is "To love one's neighbor as one's self." It is found in Matt. 22: 39. I believe it means much more than man, as a rule, is willing to allow. My understanding is that I am to love my neighbor as I love myself. Is not this the real meaning? If so, how few of us reach or even try to reach the standard as required by this commandment!

It means that while our supreme affection is to be reserved for God alone, we are to love all mankind and to show this love by practical means; we are to do and to suffer for them as we should reasonably desire them to do and suffer for us. It is to be a happy interchange of brotherly love and generous consideration in all things. It does not refer to charity any more than it does to everyday conduct in word and deed, in opinions and judgment, as well as in acts and words. It is, in a word, the supreme law of human kindness and brotherly love—the "Golden Rule" (see Matt. 7: 12). This has been summarized as "the very essence of Christian teaching." We should put ourselves in our neighbor's place, and what we consider would be most pleasing and gracious for him to do to us, that we should do to him.

Miscellaneous

A. N., Berne, Md. The same question was answered recently in THE MAIL-BAG.

Mrs. W. Holiday. Thanks for your note but we prefer the other interpretation.

J. L. D., Dallas, Texas. See reply to the question on the "spirits in prison" in another issue of THE MAIL-BAG.

Rev. J. A. Chambliss, Plainfield, N. J., writes to THE MAIL-BAG to say that the marriage law in New Jersey was changed a year or two ago and a license is now required.

W. W. D., Miami, Fla. We are entitled to pray for faith, just as we should pray for other spiritual blessings. Remember the prayer, "Lord, I believe, help thou mine unbelief." That was a prayer for increased faith.

Mrs. G. L., Port Byron, Ill. 1. The word "carriages without horses shall go" are from the old pseudo-prophecy of Mother Shipton, who was a purely mythical character. The passage in Nahum 2: 4 is singularly suggestive of the same idea.

A. J. G., Harrisburg, Pa. We think we can best serve the cause of Christ and humanity by following the plain path we are now pursuing and by avoiding all complications. To us all races and nationalities are alike; they are all God's children and our brothers.

E. A. G., Manchester, Ia. In THE MAIL-BAG the question is asked by G. B., Buffalo, N. Y. "Was it customary for Jesus' disciples to wear swords?" Turn to Luke 22: 2, 36, 37, 38, which shows that Jesus himself asked his disciples concerning swords, and therefore had knowledge of their possessing at least two swords.

H. P., Atwater, Minn. The house of God should not be made a place for commerce. While there are many things in which a congregation may engage with propriety, there are some that are better conducted elsewhere than in the church itself. This applies to fairs and bazaars, and a certain class of socials, suppers etc. Good taste and a proper respect for the church will tell you where to draw the line.

A. K., Chatfield, O. Your first question has already been dealt with in THE MAIL-BAG. I. Cor. 15: 51 refers to the putting off of the corruptible body for the incorruptible. It is applied to the Christians of that age and of the subsequent ages who are found in the attitude of "waiting" so that if Christ should come in their time they might be found among "the quick." In Rev. 21: 1, the sea is a type of unrest and division or separation. In the perfect state described in the chapter, the sea will no longer be needed as now. It was once the element of man's destruction, but will be so no longer. For your last question see I. Peter 3: 19-21.

Mâha Vaajiravudh, King of Siam

Building the Great Pyre-Shrine

The Late King Chulalongkorn

THE CREMATION OF A KING

ONE of the strangest and most impressive ceremonies ever witnessed took place at the royal city of Bangkok, the capital of Siam, on April 17. It was the official cremation of the late ruler of that country, King Chulalongkorn I., who died on October 24, 1910, and whose son, King Maha Vaajiravudh, lately ascended the throne as his lineal successor. In this last tribute of respect to the late king practically the whole Siamese people united. Chulalonghorn was an able and progressive ruler, and during his reign the ancient kingdom attained great prosperity. His people were happy and peaceful, and he was regarded by all with love and veneration. He was the author of many important reforms, chief among which was the abolition of domestic slavery throughout his kingdom.

For the purpose of the royal cremation, a large building of intricate design known as the Phra Meru was especially constructed. Four massive pillars resting on a platform formed the sub-structure, at the four corners of which were prayer towers of beautiful design, with gold roofs and sides, for the use of the priests. Hundreds of native artists and skilled craftsmen labored for months on the shrine, which was to be the dead king's pyre. They reared around it graceful pavilions and other buildings; all the architecture and decorations were in the richest style of Siamese workmanship; money was lavishly spent and the structures glowed with gold and color, and were artistically enriched with screens, royal emblems and exquisite curtains.

One eye-witness of the cremation ceremony, writing to the London Graphic, gives this description of the building:

> In the perfect symmetry of the Meru, with its lofty spire; in the crimson and gold of the ceiling where the evening breeze stirred the garlands of flowers into motion; in the beautiful decorative work of the cremation chamber, a striking object in the sea of gold and red; in the magnificent relief work at the base of the columns—everywhere was the same careful attention to detail, the same artistic success. It was a fitting chamber that the successor had caused to be erected, where the highest and lowest in the realm might take their final farewell of a great monarch.

All the pomp and splendor of the ancient East were reproduced in this great spectacle. Religious ceremonies and funeral rites preceded the final pageant, many priests and a great multitude of Siamese taking part. Then the gilded and jeweled casket in which lay the body of Chulalongkorn was borne to the place of cremation. First, the troops of Siam marched past, playing the funeral march, and took up their position on the Phra Meru. Next came the band of the royal palace guard, all scarlet-clad and playing upon silver trumpets, conch shells and metal gongs. High officials of state followed, bearing jeweled swords, spears and gilded vases. Then came a large car, in which was the High Priest Prince, clad in his official yellow robes, and reciting passages from the sacred Buddhist books as he rode. The gilded car was drawn by 150 men in red robes, and in front of it were the bearers of the royal insignia. Another equally gorgeous gilded car, drawn by 220 men, also robed in red, bore the funeral coffer, which was shielded from the sun by a huge embroidered umbrella. Kneeling beside the coffer were two royal princes dressed in white and gold. The young king, wearing a field marshal's uniform, walked in the first line of the royal mourners and acknowledged by salute the greetings of his people on every side. Representatives of all the European nations and of the United States attended the ceremonies. The naval band, with sailors and marines, closed the long procession.

On reaching the Phra Meru, the new king entered the pavilion and the various personages took their appropriate places. It was a gorgeous and imposing picture. When the coffer had been removed from the car it was elevated to its place on the pyre by an inclined plane and was then saluted by the entire assemblage. Great golden curtains were then drawn and the coffer was hidden from view. At sunset, the entire structure was illuminated by electric lights. The king ascended to the pyre amid the sound of soft dirge-like music; a royal salute was fired from the guns; the national anthem was played and the king himself applied the sacred fire to the pyre and then departed.

The royal princes, the diplomats and government officials then mounted the platform and placed their offerings of candles and sandalwood on the pyre, which was now blazing freely. It burned all through the night, and next morning it was extinguished with perfumed water. The ashes of Chulalongkorn were then enclosed in a golden urn, studded with diamonds, and taken away in solemn procession to their final resting place.

The young king who now governs the Siamese people was educated in England. He has traveled extensively, and studied carefully the affairs of his own country. Like his father, he has progressive ideas and is already very popular with his subjects.

A SERMON BY

Rev. R. A. TORREY*

THE WELL IN THE HEART

TEXT: John 4:14—"The water that I shall give him shall be in him a well of water springing up into everlasting life."

THERE is an almost matchless music in the words of my text. Long before I was converted or had any understanding of their meaning, I would come to this verse and read it time and time again. I did not know what it meant, but it seemed like a strain of music from some heavenly world. When I came to understand the meaning of these words, and came to know in my own heart that of which they speak, it would be impossible for me to tell how precious these words have been to me.

I suppose you recall the circumstances under which the Lord Jesus spoke these words. He was very tired, very thirsty, very hungry; so tired that he felt he could go no further; and he sank down in utter weariness upon Jacob's well at Sychar. He was very thirsty, but he had nothing to draw water with from that well. His disciples went on alone into the city to buy something to eat. He could not go with them. He just waited there until they should bring him something to eat. There he sits, tired, hungry, thirsty; and as he looks up the road he sees a woman, a sinner, coming to draw water out of the well; and a new thirst comes into his heart, a far more intense thirst than that for water for his body—a thirst for the salvation of that woman. As soon as she comes within speaking distance, he turns to her and says, "Give me to drink"—not so much that he wanted to quench his physical thirst, as that he had a great longing in his soul that he wanted to quench—the longing for the salvation of that woman. She in the meanness of her spirit, instead of letting down her water-pot and giving him to drink, at first tries to start a theological discussion. "How is it that thou, being a Jew, askest drink of me, who am a woman of Samaria?" (John adds the comment, "For the Jews have no dealings with the Samaritans.") And Jesus said, "If thou knewest the gift of God, and who it is that saith unto thee, Give me to drink, thou wouldest have asked of him, and he would have given thee living water." "Sir," she cries, "the well is deep, and thou hast nothing to draw with; from whence then hast thou that living water?" Jesus said to her, "Whosoever drinketh of this water shall thirst again."

Unsatisfying Fountains

How true that is of every earthly fountain! No matter how deeply we may drink, we shall thirst again. No matter how deeply one drinks of the fountain of wealth, he shall thirst again. No matter how deeply one drinks of the fountain of worldly pleasure, he shall thirst again. No matter how often or how deep one drinks of the fountain of fame, of social position, of political position, he shall thirst again. No matter how deeply they drink, they always thirst again. The earthly fountain never satisfies. Take the one who drinks at the fountain of human philosophy and science, he always thirsts again. The one who drinks at the fountain of music and art always thirsts again. It does not satisfy. Take even the one who drinks of that best of all human fountains, the fountain of human love; it does not satisfy the deepest longings of the soul; he thirsts again. "Whosoever drinketh of this water shall thirst again, but whosoever drinketh of the water that I shall give him shall never thirst; but the water that I shall give him shall be in him a well of water springing up into everlasting life." That is the way to be fully and forever satisfied. Drink of the water Jesus gives. You will not thirst forever; you will have a fountain within you, springing up into everlasting life.

The water that Jesus gives is the Holy Spirit. You say, "How do you know that the water that Jesus gives is the Holy Spirit?" Because the Bible says so in John 7: 37-39: "In the last day, that great day of the feast, Jesus stood and cried, saying, If any man thirst, let him come unto me, and drink. He that believeth on me, as the Scripture hath said, out of his belly shall flow rivers of living water. (But this spake he of the Spirit, which they that believe on him should receive: for the Holy Ghost was not yet given; because that Jesus was not yet glorified.)" Here we are told in so many words that the water that Jesus gives is the Holy Spirit. When any one receives the Holy Spirit, the Holy Spirit becomes within him a well of water, a never-ceasing fountain of satisfaction and rest and joy, springing up, springing up into everlasting life.

* Pastor Moody Church, Chicago, Ill.

It is a great thing to have a fountain that you can carry around with you. Some years ago, I had occasion to build a summer home in Northfield, Mass. Mr. Needham, the evangelist, and I were out walking one day and when we got within about five minutes of the Auditorium, there was a hill rising from the road. Mr. Needham said, "Torrey, I believe if we would go up to the top of that hill, we would get a good view." I said, "Let's go." We climbed the hill and it was a wonderful view. Right at our feet were the Seminary buildings, then the broad Connecticut River running through the valley, then the valley beyond the river, then a tier of hills and then another tier, and still another, four, five, six, seven tiers of hills all lying in the golden light of the setting sun. I said, "I am going to buy this hill and build a house right here." I went to see the farmer the next day and he told me what he would take for the hill and I bought it.

The Hilltop Spring

After some months I went to work to build, and my friends would drive along at the bottom of the hill and they would call me down and say, "Torrey, are you crazy? What are you building for way up on top of that hill? That is no place to build. You cannot get any water up there." Now that was where they were mistaken; for before we had ever struck a spade into the ground, one day walking over the hill with the farmer from whom I had bought it, about one hundred feet perhaps from the house, I saw a depression, and I said to him, "I believe if I should dig right there, I should strike water," and he said, "It does look like it." I said, "I am sure there is a spring right there." And we dug a hole about four feet across, and when they had gone down about eight feet, we had five feet of water, clear as crystal, cool, soft, delicious, pure. Well, that well ran on year after year, never abated in its strength. We had great droughts, and other people's wells would run dry, but my well on the top of the hill would just have the same amount of water, five feet of water; and it was such clear water you would think there wasn't any water in it, that you were just looking through the air. But there was one trouble with that well. I could not take it with me. Most of the time since I had that well dug, I have been away from there, sometimes 12,000 miles away. During the Spanish-American War, I was down in Chickamauga with the troops, and there was no rain and we had 60,000 troops. Why, the dust was thirty feet high, and we ate dust, and we slept dust, and we drank dust. How I used to long for my well up there on the hilltop! But I had to leave it behind. Near us was a well, but if you drank at it you would be flat on your back in fifteen minutes.

The Well in the Heart

But all the time I was thinking of that well so far away, I had another well in my heart that I had taken with me. I had a well within my heart springing up, springing up into everlasting life. It is a great thing to have a well you can always carry with you. When you receive the Holy Spirit you have a fountain you can take with you, everywhere, to all eternity.

It is also a great thing to have a well within you as your source of joy instead of being dependent on things outside of you for your joy. If your joy is in your environment, sometimes you will be happy (when your environment is pleasant), but when your environment is not pleasant you will be miserable. You will be happy when you are prosperous in business, and miserable when you are not prosperous. Sometimes you will be well, and sometimes you will be sick; if you are well you will be happy, but if you are sick, you will be miserable. Then the day always comes sooner or later when our dearest friends are taken from us; then if your joy is in things without you, in these moments of deepest sorrow, you will be miserable; but if you have a fountain within you, in these moments of deepest sorrow you will be happy, and the fountain within, the Holy Spirit, turns the moments of deepest sorrow into moments of unutterable gladness.

The Holy Spirit never so fills the heart and never so fills the soul with gladness as he does in moments of deep bereavement.

Friends, it is a wonderful thing to have the Holy Spirit in your heart when sorrow comes. It turns the deepest sorrow into the gladdest joy. What is any earthly fountain worth in a time of sorrow? Is there any comfort in wealth when the dear one is taken away? The rich man is as sad as the poor man. Is there any comfort in the pleasures of this world at such an hour? Do you want to go to the theatre? Do you want to go to a card party? Do you want to go to a dance? Such things only bring agony in such an hour. What comfort is there in music, and art, and philosophy? Or in political position, or power, or honor? None at all; but oh, if you have the fountain within, the Holy Spirit within your heart, these moments of deepest sorrow become the moments of our supreme gladness.

If you have the fountain within, the Holy Spirit in your heart, you will be independent of the world's sources of joy and pleasure. You won't have to run after the dance, the theatre and the cards. You will have something infinitely better. I sometimes think it does not do much good to talk to people and say, "You must give up your dancing, your cards and theatres." To them it seems as if life would not be worth living without these things; they are all they have. But get them to receive the Holy Spirit; then they get something that is so much better that they will give these things up without a struggle. What does a person who has a cool crystal spring to drink of want with a muddy old pool?

The World's "Muddy Pools"

A lady in Philadelphia came to Mr. Moody once and said, "I don't like you." "Is that so?" said Mr. Moody. "Why don't you like me?" She said, "Because you are too narrow." "Is that so?" said Mr. Moody. "I didn't know I was narrow. Why do you think I am narrow?" "Because you don't believe in going to the theatre, and you don't believe in dancing, and you don't believe in playing cards." "Why," said Mr. Moody, "I go to the theatre myself whenever I want to." "You do, Mr. Moody?" she exclaimed; "why, you are much broader than I thought you were." "Yes," said Mr. Moody, "I go to the theatre whenever I want to. I don't want to." If you get the Holy Ghost in your heart, you won't want to. When you drink of this living fountain you will not want these muddy pools any more. Another lady said to Mr. Moody, "I heard you say, 'I go to the theatre whenever I want to,' and I did not understand it. I understand it now. I was converted the other night in your meeting. My husband afterwards asked me to go to the theatre and though I did not care to go, I went to please him; I did not want him to go alone. The curtain went up and the play began. It had not gone very far when something that was said just grated upon this new life, and I whispered to my husband, 'I have got to go. I can't stand this.' He replied, 'Don't make a fool of yourself. You need never come again, just stay this play out.' I braced up and tried to stand it through. Pretty soon something else was said that grated, and it just seemed as if I could not stand it, and I said to my husband, 'I must go.' He said, 'Don't make a scene right here. You needn't come again.' Again I tried to stay, but something else grated, and I said, 'I have just got to go.' He said, 'Don't make a fool of yourself.' I replied, 'I have been making a fool of myself all my life, and I am not going to make a fool of myself any longer,' and I left." When you get the Holy Spirit in your heart, you cannot be happy in the theatre, you cannot be happy at a dance. You won't want these things. A well of water within, springing up, springing up into everlasting life. Why is it then that so many Christians are running after these things? It is either because they have never received the Holy Spirit (and that is true of a great many professed Christians), or else the fountain is choked. Don't you know it is quite possible to choke a fountain?

I was born in the city and brought up in the city and when I was ten years old I was sick and tired of the city, and my other two brothers were too, and we wanted to go to the country, and we went to my father and said, "Let's get out of Brooklyn. Buy a place out in the country, and let's live out there." My father said, "Well, boys, I guess I will." He

He could not buy it, as it s not for sale; but a friend said to h, "Reuben, I think I know a place t will satisfy you. The Colonel s ill place is for sale." My father nt up to see it, and bought it at once. e man who had built the place had nt a great deal of money upon it, the natural contour of the land was , and he wanted a hill, so that he ld see over the town and twenty es up the lake. Discouragement and Power

By EUGENE THWING

WHEN there is so much wickedness and greed on every hand, so much of injustice and cruelty—when business difficulties crush and family trials harrow the soul, what can one tired heart find to give it strength? What hope is there that a single individual can set in motion any force that will prevail?

It is all very well to talk of the power and the great achievements that lie within the grasp of the "one man" or the "one woman in a million"; but in real life where does the power begin? How can the achievements that seem to mock us with their magnitude and with our littleness be made our own, when there is everything to discourage us and make us pessimistic of the outcome? We want to see and recognize something that we can believe in, something that will bring back our faith that there is a force for good which we, as individuals, can lay hold of with hope of overcoming the evil that appals us.

SUCH a force is at hand for every one. There is no doubt of it. He who recognizes and believes in the desire for good and the purpose to do good and not evil in his own heart must believe that the same desire and purpose live in other hearts. To waken this desire, to rouse this purpose, until they shall take control of the life and result in action, this is to put into operation "a force for good" that will counteract and overcome the evil in business, society and public affairs.

Do you want "something to believe in?" Believe in yourself. You are not dead clay waiting for the hand of some master sculptor to fashion it into a semblance of life. You are not a thing that must wait to be acted upon by other men. You are a living soul. The beginning of things is in you. There is "a force for good," and it must start from your own soul. Begin to act in accordance with your own longings and aspirations. Begin to respond to your own need, and you will find not only that your need is being satisfied, but that the "force for good" which you set agoing will affect other lives.

WHAT is "a force" after all? In the physical world or in the moral world, what is force? It is nothing but an aggregation of units moving or striving to move in a certain direction. These units have various names—pounds, volts, degrees, horse-powers, etc.; but the force is great or little according as the units are many or few. In the "force for good" you are longing for, the units are human lives—nothing else. The power of God works in the world only through human lives. Do you expect the "force for good" to be made up somewhere afar off and come sweeping hitherward like a mighty rushing wind, or a devouring flame, consuming the "evil" in its path while you stand and look on waiting to shout "Glory to God!" when the work is done? Or do you expect the "force for good" to spring into being spontaneously in the community, taking in all other human life units while you prepare to rejoice in the results which you have not helped to achieve? Perhaps other units—who knows how many of them?—are waiting to be jostled into motion by the unit of force which you are yourself.

There is an immense "force for good" in the world, but too much of it is at rest. In your own particular environment the units all around you may be at rest. It is up to you to get them started in the right direction by starting that way yourself.

"DISCOURAGEMENT is a form of atheism," said Dr. Parkhurst. "A man may accept God in his creed, but he does not accept him in his heart if he finds himself interpreting an ebb-tide as a symptom that we have had our last flood-tide. Believing in God when the time is favorable is often a belief in the favorableness of the times a great deal more than it is a belief in God." As we believe in him, we must believe in the power for good which he has in us or is ready to put in us for use in the world. He deals with individuals before he deals with multitudes or with nations.

Love is called the greatest force in the world, but there could be no love without human hearts. Even God's love is meaningless and powerless in the world aside from its working in and through human hearts. You have this power, this mighty force at your command. As Mrs. L. M. Child expressed it years ago, "The cure for all the ills and wrongs, the cares, the sorrows, and the crimes of humanity, all lies in that one word love; it is the divine vitality that everywhere produces and restores life; to each and every one of us it gives the power of working miracles if we will."

HERE, then, is the answer to our questionings—here is "something to believe in": believe in yourself, believe in your own power, in your own calling, in your own responsibility, in your own destiny. Believe that when God breathed into man's nostrils his own breath and made man a living soul—when he gave man dominion over the earth and commanded him to subdue it, that he gave him also the power to do as commanded, and that man is here to subdue and not to be subdued. In the name of him who gave that power and appointed that high destiny, do not lose hope—do not be crushed down. There is more good than evil in the world, though it does not make as much noise. Theodore Roosevelt spoke only the truth when he said, "The forces of truth and love and courage and honesty and generosity and sympathy are stronger than ever before."

Take to yourself the exhortation of Paul and "be not overcome of evil, but overcome evil with good." Employ to its utmost the force for good that reposes in your own life, and set it at work to counteract some at least of the injustice and grind and crushing and greed. Set it at work, also, in disturbing the repose of other "units of force" around you and getting them to work.

Standard Oil Decision

ON THE afternoon of May 15 the Supreme Court of the United States handed down its final decision in one of the great anti-trust cases whose results have been awaited so long. This case, which was prosecuted under the Sherman Anti-Trust law, was that of the United States against the Standard Oil Company of New Jersey. The decree of the Circuit Court directing the dissolution of the Oil Trust was affirmed by the higher court, but its directions were modified in two particulars. These two modifications are that the period allowed for the execution of the decree is extended from thirty days to six months and the injunction against engaging in inter-State trade in petroleum and its products during the execution of the decree is removed. The removal of the injunction against inter-State trade during the six months allowed for the closing up of the corporate affairs of the trust is due entirely to a consideration of the serious injury which might result to the public from a complete cessation of the business for such a length of time.

In this, the first of its big decisions in the anti-trust cases, the court determines against the Standard Oil Company on the ground that it is a combination in unreasonable restraint of inter-State commerce. Thus, after a fight which has lasted through many years and in which every obstacle known to the legal profession has been interposed, the Federal Government has finally succeeded in its efforts to compel this giant corporation to cast off its holding company and again to separate itself into its thirty-three constituent parts.

The judges of the Supreme Court were unnanimous in their decision on the matter, the only objection being raised by Justice Harlan, who concurred in the general decision, but wished to have the word unreasonable omitted from the findings of the court.

For the first time since it has been construing the Sherman Anti-Trust act the court takes that position, and thus definitely reads the word "unreasonable" into the law. It was on this ground that Justice Harlan dissented.

Justice Harlan sharply criticised the majority of the court for taking this position. He declared it to be a menace to the institutions of the country. He said it was amending the Constitution by judicial interpretation, and was unjustified.

The decision was received with varying emotions by the crowd in the little court room. Some of the opinions expressed later were as follows: Attorney-General Wickersham: "Substantially every proposition contended for by the government is affirmed." Frank B. Kellogg, counsel for government: "It is a complete victory for the government." Senator Kenyon, formerly Assistant Attorney-General: "I think the court has amended the anti-trust law, and it will lead to trouble." Senator La Follette: "I fear that the court has done what the trusts wanted it to do, and what Congress has steadily refused to do."

Jail Sentences Recalled

SAMUEL GOMPERS, John Mitchell, and Frank Morrison, the president, vice president, and secretary, respectively, of the American Federation of Labor, will not have to serve the jail sentences imposed on them by the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia for contempt of its decree in the famous suit of the Bucks Stove and Range Company of St. Louis against them for an injunction restraining them from continuing the boycott laid by the Federation against that concern.

The Supreme Court of the United States, in a unanimous decision, handed down by Justice Lamar on May 15, reversed the District Court and remanded the case, with directions to dismiss it, but the dismissal is to be without prejudice to the right of the District Court to proceed properly against the labor union men for criminal contempt.

Justice Lamar showed that the jail sentences were imposed as punishment for criminal contempt as a part of the relief prayed for by the Bucks Stove and Range Company. The District Courts simply mixed up civil and criminal proceedings in one case, and the United States Supreme Court informs them that that cannot be done.

OUR FIRST SUFFRAGE PARADE

By KATE UPSON CLARK

THE MARYLAND AND NEW JERSEY DELEGATIONS IN LINE JUST AFTER THE PARADE LEFT FIFTY-NINTH STREET

IN SPITE of the fact that certain among the suffragists believe that parades do not help any cause, others feel that they do. Accordingly, under the special inspiration of Mrs. Harriet Stanton Blatch, President of the Woman's Political Union, a great procession of suffragists marched down Fifth Avenue in New York on Saturday, May 6. It extended over ten city blocks and in its ranks, side by side, marched the wives of millionaires and hard-working shop girls; professional women whose names are honored throughout our whole land, and humble toilers who earn their daily bread in obscure corners.

It was an impressive and cheering sight, and the thousands of spectators who lined the sidewalks of New York's most famous thoroughfare, many of whom had come to jeer, were moved to an admiration which was not unmixed with emotion as they beheld it. In the words of the poet Goldsmith, it might almost have been said that "those who came to scoff remained to pray." Some of the older and feebler of the veteran suffragists rode; but among the straightest and proudest of the 4,000 marchers were many gray-haired women, who had worked through long lifetimes to secure the ballot for woman and to free her from the stigma of classification with the incapables.

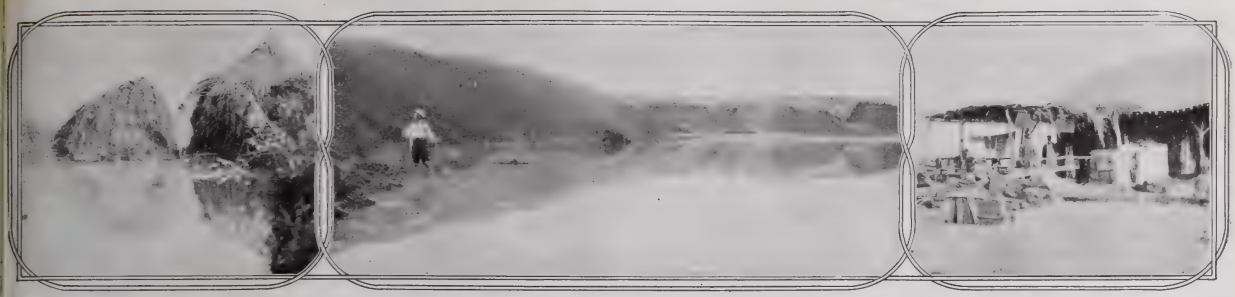
At the head of the procession marched four of the youngest and prettiest of the whole number. They were dressed in white, and kept their eyes directed straight forward, while their bearing was full of dignity. Then came a band of Scotch pipers, followed by a dainty little matron borne by four men in an old-fashioned sedan chair. She typified the lady of "ye olden tyme." Appropriately, a float behind her showed an antique kitchen, with its brick fireplace, a hanging kettle on its crane, and women spinning and weaving near by. Then trial women, jewelers, dressmakers, milliners, laundresses, tea-room proprietors, cooks, hairdressers and artists' models marched in the section. Farmers, actresses, painters, sculptors, interior decorators, musicians, journalists, editors, librarians, public readers and lecturers filled the second division. The third comprised the college women, teachers, students, lawyers, architects, engineers, clergywomen, doctors and nurses. This division excelled all others in its admirable marching, except the fourth, in which were the business women: clerks, typists, stenographers, secretaries, investigators, social workers, women of affairs, athletic women, chauffeurs, four-in-hand drivers, aeronauts and explorers. The fifth division held the suffrage pioneers, home-makers, sympathizers, civil servants, office-holders, watchers, voters and tax-payers. The sixth and seventh divisions were devoted to the different suffrage organizations. Of these the Men's League for Woman Suffrage was by far the most conspicuous. Every woman must be especially grateful to those two hundred splendid men, who showed their colors thus openly in the great woman's parade. Their numbers and their noble bearing contributed immensely to the wonderful success of the demonstration. When, at the end of the procession, they marched with banners flying into Union Square, the women gave them an enthusiastic greeting. Among them were Professors John Dewey and Vladimir Simkhovitch of Columbia University, James Le Laidlaw, the distinguished banker, and many men of light and leading.



The few women [illegible] bore a banner on which was emblazoned a golden crown, labeled, "The Suffrage." Under it were

A NIGHT AT THE DEAD SEA

The Flooded Bedouin Encampment | The River Jordan in Flood Time | The Arab House Where the Night Was Spent

By CARLTON H. TYNDALL

WE HAD been in Jerusalem over a week and it had rained every day. As that was our second visit and we had seen the various points of interest, we were eager to start on our horseback trip northward. We had not as yet visited the Jordan and Dead Sea, and were waiting for a fair day on which to make that excursion. Finally on the 31st of March of last year, when the sun arose in a cloudless sky, they told us at our hotel that the rain was over and we might safely go down to Jericho.

We hurried outside the Jaffa Gate, where carriages were usually engaged, but it was impossible to get one. We endeavored to procure saddle horses, but the supply had been exhausted, and so we inquired if strong donkeys could convey us as well. Some said that with such beasts we would not reach Jericho until night, but we had ridden them many times, and although the prospect of a fifty-mile donkey ride in a day and a half was anything but pleasant, we determined not to waste a single pleasant day.

At nine o'clock, accompanied by our donkey-boy, we started. Leaving the city by the Dung Gate, we skirted the Valley of Hinnom, crossed the Valley of Jehoshaphat, and soon the Mount of Olives had cut off our view of Jerusalem and we were well on our way to Bethany.

As soon as we had lunched at Jericho, we remounted our donkeys and started for the River Jordan. We pursued a southeasterly course over the plain and in a few minutes had crossed the Brook Cherith, which was so swollen by the constant rains that our animals had to be driven through it.

At three o'clock we reached a spot opposite the ford El-Henu only to find that the river had overflowed its banks for a half mile inland and that the willows, tarfa trees and poplars, which fringe the margin of the stream, completely hid it from view. The River Jordan was one of the attractions that had lured us seven thousand miles. To return without seeing it would surely be a cause for future regret. After telling our donkey-boy that we wanted to go down to the Dead Sea that afternoon, we dismounted and left him with the crowd that came in carriages. We took off our shoes and, rolling up our trousers, waded toward the main stream. Presently we found the water over three feet deep and so proceeded more to the north. We met a native in our wanderings and tried to make him understand that we wished to see the Jordan. He motioned us to follow him and after wading perhaps a quarter mile we found ourselves among a dozen natives in the midst of a Bedouin encampment composed of partly submerged straw shacks. We made our guide understand that this was not what we were looking for and, after getting a photograph, we left the settlement. An hour's walking and wading brought us to Kasr el-Yehud, near which is the famous Ford of the Jordan. Here we had a view of the river that well repaid us for our arduous journey.

We stayed long enough to take a couple of pictures and then started back. The walking was bad and the wading was worse, so it was five o'clock when we reached the place where we had left our donkeys. What was our surprise to find that the donkey-boy and all the carriages had gone. We shouted with all our might, but no one was within hearing distance. After waiting a few minutes we started southward toward the Dead Sea, thinking that the lad might have gone there since we had impressed upon him the fact that we surely must visit that place before we returned to Jericho.

In many places the water had so covered the road that we had to leave it for the hills and ridges. We did not know then how dangerous this was, but were afterwards informed by the American Consul in Jerusalem that there are often slime pits within fifty feet of the road from which escape is impossible if a person gets into one of them.

Before we had completed our seven-mile tramp across the soft plain it began to grow dark and we wondered what we should do if we failed to find either our donkey-boy or a dwelling at the Dead Sea.

However, soon after dark, when we came in sight of the Dead Sea we were gladdened by the sight of a light. A large pond separated us from the building in which it shone, and, before wading over, we made as loud a noise as our parched throats would allow. When the demonstration had been repeated several times an Arab, armed with a rifle and followed by a dog, came out and hailed us in his native tongue. Finding that we were unable to answer intelligently in Arabic he motioned that we should come across the pond.

He led us into a big room, in the centre of which there were several Arabs squatting around a fire. They questioned us in their language and we replied in ours, so they were none the wiser as to why we had come. The prospect of spending the night with them certainly was not inviting, but it was better than being outdoors in the mud, and we were glad to be sheltered by a roof and near a cheerful fire.

After a few minutes one of the Arabs went out and brought in a man who was evidently a European. We were glad indeed to learn that he was a Bulgarian, who with his wife occupied the other end of the shack.

We followed him to his room and discovered that while he spoke several languages he had not as yet learned more than a score of words of ours. They were much puzzled as to our reason for coming there at that time, and we were unable to put their minds at ease. They had just finished their supper, but they immediately re-set the table and gave us a meal that was a great surprise. Among the dishes set before us were beans, sardines, bread, pickles, Holland cheese, oranges and lemonade. Our long walk had given us good appetites, and we were glad to find such hospitable people in that out-of-the-way place. They urged us to occupy their bed for the night. Of course we would not listen to such a proposition, so they covered a long bench with blankets and we were glad to make the best of the makeshift. We didn't get much sleep, however, for the Arabs in the other end of the house talked furiously until long past midnight.

The next morning after we had made a good breakfast of chocolate and English crackers, a caravan of camels and donkeys came down to the sea, laden with merchandise for the towns at its southern end. When they had unloaded the beasts, the men drove them into the water, where they floated about like huge buoys. The water is said to possess antiseptic properties. I hope it helped to heal the sores on those poor camels and donkeys, for they were a pitiful sight.

At seven o'clock we commenced our ten-mile tramp back to Jericho by a road farther from the Jordan and in consequence less muddy than the one we traversed the night before. Just as we were fording the Brook Cherith near Jericho a mounted policeman accosted us and asked if we were Americans. Upon our answering in the affirmative he at once rode on into the town and before we could get our stockings on he had brought a crowd from our hotel down to the brook.

It seems that after the carriages had returned to Jericho, our donkey-boy was afraid to stay alone and soon followed them, reporting on his arrival that we had gone in swimming and had probably been drowned. The Turkish officials doubted his story and after flogging the poor lad on general principles, dispatched mounted police to scour the plain all night in search of us. They said that roaming bands of lawless Bedouins infest that section and in consequence robberies and murders are of too frequent occurrence. We thought there was little ground for their fears until the American Consul at Jerusalem told us of several instances in which tourists had been robbed and killed by these roving bandits.

"Lest We Forget"

MEN'S memories are short. In the ancient times, God burned into the minds of his people in hard and terrible ways the remembrance of his great mercies. Even the generation which had witnessed the miracles in Egypt soon lost the deep impression which had been made upon them. He knew how succeeding generations would soon forget them altogether unless the story was kept alive by solemn ceremonies, often repeated, and by costly and bloody sacrifices.

To us of a latter and, as we are wont to think, a better day, the lesson still comes with force. We shall forget the magnificent sacrifices through which we have derived universal liberty, unless we are continually and strongly reminded of them. Therefore it is well that we of the North and the South alike should on this day repair to the graves of those who died in the great civil war; remind ourselves afresh of their courage and their virtues; and rejoice in the united and prosperous country which they bequeathed to us—a country which already, perhaps, holds the balance of power in the civilized world; and which, if we fulfil our rightful destiny, will soon be able to control public opinion in both hemispheres—not by the conquest of fire and sword, but by the wisdom and love and greatness of our people.

In every community on this sacred day there should be public and dignified exercises by which the ignorant and the careless should be instructed and thrilled to a higher patriotism. In every family there should be mention made of the glories and the sorrows of those stirring days of '61. God has dealt graciously with us; but too often when he dealt thus with his chosen people their hearts were "lifted up" and they forgot him and the wonderful way in which he had led them. Let not this stigma rest upon our own beloved nation.

Let us not forget God's goodness and the great blessing which came out of all the trials and sorrows which Memorial Day commemorates—trials that have bound our people in one family.

Before many years, the last veteran of the Civil War will have grounded arms. Let us hope and pray that this day may continue to be celebrated while the nation lasts, while equally we pray and hope that our national peace may never again be interrupted by the clash of hostile weapons.

Financial Neutrality in War

FOR the first time in the history of the Peace Movement, the financial element came to the front in the Baltimore Congress. One of the leading representatives of the money interests, Mr. Speyer, the New York banker, indicated the new attitude of capital towards war by suggesting the adoption of a policy of financial neutrality, under which nations, to a very large extent if not altogether, might prevent loans being raised within their territory or by their own people to enable other nations to carry on war against each other. Several bankers spoke on similar lines and favored the submission of this novel proposition to the next Hague Conference. It is impossible to estimate the far reaching importance of this plan for withholding the "sinews of battle" from governments contemplating hostilities. The whole literature of modern warfare begins and ends with a loan. There is probably not a "leading power," European or Asiatic, which has not floated war loans within the last half century without which it is doubtful if ever they could have begun hostilities. If the stock exchanges and leading banks of half a dozen capitals were to adopt the future policy of turning down the applications of bellicose governments for floating war loans, they would indeed be giving most efficient aid to the peace movement. Grub-stake loans for foreign wars have been raised here and elsewhere in recent years, the refusal to float which would have halted hostilities and prevented the firing of a single shot; but when the financiers opened their treasuries, the coin they poured out was the price of thousands of lives needlessly sacrificed, and of immeasurable sorrow and hardship to innocent people. If the financial magnates should unite on such a policy as Mr. Speyer has outlined, they would indeed deserve to be regarded as world benefactors.

As to the Peace Circles

LAST week we announced the proposed organization of Peace Circles throughout the country. Arrangements are now under way for a complete working plan for such Circles, which we are assured will meet with a favorable reception. They will not only be attractive and popular as a means of extending the Peace Movement, but will be welcomed in every community wherever organized, as an aid to the development of the best powers of the men and women who join them, as a fine training in public speaking and right thinking, and as an inspiration to good citizenship and well-rounded manhood and womanhood. We repeat our invitation to all who desire to do pioneer work in this great and popular movement to send in their names and addresses to the PEACE CIRCLE DEPARTMENT of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD without delay. There is no higher patriotism or better public service than this opportunity affords.

Let Justice Be Done

LITTLE profit and less edification can result from the charges and counter-charges that have filled the columns of the daily newspapers in the discussion of the Los Angeles dynamite explosion case. Since the arrest of the two McNamaras, who are accused of the crime, there has been an intermittent fusilade between Detective Burns and President Gompers of the Federation of Labor, the sole effect of which has been to intensify the already bitter feeling. All the facts must come out at the approaching trial. It will then be shown whether or not Detective Burns can substantiate his charges. If he establishes the guilt of the accused, the representatives of labor—who have stood by them giving them the fullest benefit of the doubt—should be the first to repudiate them and to recognize the justice of the law in adequately punishing so foul a crime. On the other hand, the accused will be represented by able counsel and will have every opportunity to prove their innocence. There are thousands who would gladly believe them innocent; but they can neither be vindicated nor convicted by further trying the case in the newspapers. Let us hope that there may be no miscarriage of justice, one way or the other, and that the real facts may soon be brought to light, fixing the responsibility for the deed. A fair and full trial is the one thing to be desired to fix the responsibility for a deed, the vileness of which shocked the whole country. Let us not judge in advance, but with unbiased minds wait the ordeal of the courts.

Polygamy Recrudescent

ACCORDING to the Mormon organ, the Deseret News, which reports the eighty-first annual Mormon Conference held recently at Salt Lake City, President Joseph Smith delivered a most remarkable address on that occasion. Speaking of plural marriages he said:

> We ought to obey the rules of the Church with regard to marriage. Eleven hundred marriages were contracted last year not in accordance with the law of God. As announced time and time again at these conferences, plural marriages have ceased in the Church. There is no man who is authorized to perform a plural marriage. No man and no woman have the authority to have this ceremony performed for them. We have been doing all in our power to stop this.

He added that neither he nor any other Mormon had any objection to the regulation of plural marriage by the federal government, and that "it would be a godsend to the people everywhere" if the States petitioned the government to regulate the whole subject of marriage throughout the Union. Without discussing the sincerity of this last declaration, it must strike the average reader that the fact that 1,100 illegal marriages admittedly occurred in a single year, apparently without any serious attempt to check so vast an evil, gives color to the charge that plural marriage is flourishing to-day in Mormon territory unhindered. Such an admission from the head of the Mormon Church, coupled with the statement that that church is unable to check the evil, although solemnly pledged to do so, shows conclusively that the anti-polygamy law is very much of a dead letter. We have to face the ugly fact that dual marriage is flourishing as flagrantly as ever while the church officials, consenting to the disobedience, close their eyes at the immoral and lawless conditions around them.

The Man Who Turned Not Back

SENOR DON FRANCISCO DE MADERO, the "man of the hour" in Mexico, is a small, compactly-knit, quiet gentleman. He is known among his associates as a reliable leader, sound and conservative in council and a good listener. Leaving his profession to take up the cause of the revolution, he put everything else behind him and deliberately accepted the risks which such a position involved. He is not a fire-eater at all, but rather of a humane disposition. Just before the attack on Juarez, he sent a message to General Navarro, the Federal commander, advising surrender to save needless waste of life, as the revolutionary forces outnumbered the Federals and he felt confident of the result. There is not a member of General Madero's staff who does not overtop him in inches, but the silent little man is easily the leading and controlling agent among the turbulent spirits that surround him. He is "Provisional President"; but should the revolution succeed, as now seems probable, Madero will promptly stand aside for some one of more statesman-like calibre and larger public experience to be President of the Republic after Diaz. However matters turn out, the modest, self-reliant little man who "having put his hand to the plow turned not back," has made history in Mexico, and he will be worthily remembered by its people.

Ominous News from China

IT IS with great regret that we are compelled to announce the receipt of news from Shanghai which may make it necessary to continue the relief work a little longer. Mr. John C. Ferguson, one of the chairmen of the Shanghai Relief Committee, writes: "Latest reports from the famine districts are most distressing. Rain for the past month is destroying the spring crops. It seems that we shall need to continue relief well along till the end of June. Anything you can send after the receipt of this letter will be most welcome."

This gloomy view of the situation is corroborated by letters from the missionaries at Chin-kiang. Dr. Woods of Tsing-kiangpu writes that one-third of the crop was ruined as early as April 13. Dr. Junkin of Suchien makes a similar statement and forecasts a total loss. In view of the prospective partial or complete failure of the early wheat harvest, which all looked forward to as the one bright hope of the near future, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD feels it to be a duty to postpone the closing of the Relief Fund. Contributions will therefore continue to be received by this journal and forwarded to the Relief Committee until May 31.

THE BIBLE AND NEWSPAPER

Revealed by the Spade

THE Mohammedan world is stirred with hottest anger and Christian nations with the deepest interest at the claim of a certain exploring arty that it has found the Ark of the Covenant, hich was lost to mortal sight and knowledge 2,500 years ago. These excavators are said to have dug under the Mosque of Omar in Jerusalem and found the Ark of the Covenant that Moses built. This mosque, travelers are told, stands on the exact spot where the second temple was. It is possible that there are tombs or hiding places for the preservation of precious relics, but there is a widespread skepticism in the minds of the public in egard to the claims that these discoverers have ound the Ark of the Covenant of the Jews; but hould it prove to be true it would reveal the reatest discovery that the spade has ever made. he yacht containing the explorers is now on its ay through the Mediterranean to England, where, f they shall have been successful, they will be able o furnish material evidences of the fact. The Iohammedans are angry at the explorers for two easons. They fear hat the sacred rock as been tampered vith, and that is the nost holy spot to them n all Jerusalem. It s the centre of the Holy Hill, the reason or the existence of he Mosque of Omar. Secondly, the Mohammedans declare that he Ark of the Covenant, which they revere, is not and never as been underneath heir Mosque, but that, ogether with the rod of Moses, it lies in the ake of Tiberias, and n the last day it will e brought forth. The Ark of the Covenant vas the centre of Jewish worship in the abernacle and in the emple. For a thouand years the loyal lew counted it the arthly residence and hrone of Jehovah. The seven-branched olden candlestick was aken by Titus to Rome, when he took the second temple, for its noney value. The Ark of the Covenant was lost, nd there is no authentic record of when it was lost r of what became of it. There is a bare possibility hat this exploring expedition has found it, but there s the greater likelihood that it was carried away, ike the candlestick, for the gold that was without nd within it, and that the statement concerning the liscovery is erroneous. A description is given of he transfer of the Ark of the Covenant into the emple of Solomon.

The Sacred Ark

And the priests brought in the Ark of the Covenant of the Lord nto his place, into the oracle of the house, to the most holy place, even under the wings of the cherubim. (I. Kings 8:6.)

No More Green Tea

It is said that there will be no more green tea in he market, but those who use tea will still have that which tastes the same but does not look green. The eaf will be dry and yellow and not of the present olished, emerald hue. The Tea Board at Washingon, composed of seven tea experts, appointed by the ea trade of the country to keep the standards high nd obey the pure food law, are responsible for the dict that tea is to be green no more. Black tea has een cured simply by drying it in the sun, but green ea has been cured by the Japanese and Chinese, by a quicker process. The fresh plucked leaves are put n a pot over a fire. As they are dried, the Chinese r Japanese who stands over the pot rakes over the eaves constantly with his fingers and sprinkles them ith a certain mysterious powder. So little of this owder is used that one pinch will cover a whole hest of fifty pounds. The leaves of the black and reen tea are identical; the only difference being that the black tea is dried in the sun and the green by an artificial fire. It is claimed that the coloring matter preserves the tea for its long voyage, and that there will be difficulty in setting it down in as good condition in the foreign markets, as under the present process. Comparatively little difference will be recognized by the tea-drinker, as the tea cured over the fire will taste like green tea whether it be green or not. There are leaves used for food and those that are employed for medicine. The tea leaf is an article of food. There is a difference of opinion as to whether tea is healthy or injurious to the human system. In the eye of the prophet there was a tree whose fruit was used for food, but whose leaves were a medicine.

And the fruit thereof shall be for meat, and the leaf thereof for medicine. (Ezek. 47:12.)

Cruelty to Animals

In a civilized and Christian age it could hardly be imagined that there could be so much cruelty manifested toward animals. The Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals has greatly benefited the silent victims. The first year's report of the Woman's League for Animals has just been published. This society used to be Woman's Auxiliary to the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals. But as it determined to teach the poor and children kindness to animals, it was thought best to incorporate a separate organization. The report says that the work-horse parade held last May, and which is to be an annual feature, was a great success, $2,000 in cash prizes being awarded to drivers, and twenty-two Speyer medals distributed among the drivers of the various city departments. Governor Wilson of New Jersey signed the Radcliffe bill, which carries a severe penalty for the killing of wild birds for millinery purposes, and also prohibits persons from having the plumage of such birds in their possession; and thus the cruelty and barbarism of fashion has been rebuked. Cruelty to animals out of heartlessness or passion, or from alcoholic frenzy, is bad enough; but the slaughter of beautiful song-birds for the decoration of big hats sheltering small brains in the service of an empty vanity seems even worse. Cruelty to the horse, the faithful friend and servant to man, has existed from the earliest times until now. When David defeated Hadarezer king of Zopah, and captured his infantry and cavalry, he had all of the chariot horses of the enemy hamstrung; that is, had the tendon of the hind leg cut.

David also houghed all the chariot horses, but reserved of them a hundred chariots. (I. Chron. 18:4.)

Rib in His Head

Between one and two years ago, George Williams of New Orleans was struck on the head with a club, and to save his life a piece of his skull was removed. The pressure of the scalp on the unprotected membrane beneath it caused an irritation of the brain cells which threw the man into frequent paroxysms. He became a patient in the City Hospital, St. Louis, Mo., and the surgeon cut out one of his ribs and with it covered the open place in the man's skull, which promises to stop the irritation and to prolong the man's life. Patching the skull with a piece of skull bone has not been unusual, but this transfer of the rib to the back of the head is said to be the first experiment of the kind in the history of the world. The prophet makes mention of surgery in the case of a fracture.

Son of man, I have broken the arm of Pharaoh, king of Egypt; and, lo, it shall not be bound up to be healed, to put a roller to bind it, to make it strong to hold the sword. (Ezek. 30:21.)

Light in the East

Two events in the Far East are of great importance and promise. One is the long-looked-for edict abolishing the Grand Council of China and the substitution of a constitutional cabinet of ten members. The cabinet is made up of the present grand councilors, with the addition of Liang Tun Yen, the former president of the Foreign Board. Prince Ching becomes Premier and Minister of Foreign Affairs and Na-Tung and Hsu Shih-Chang are made Vice Prime Ministers. The substitution of this cabinet with Prince Ching and the heads of the ten executive departments for the old Grand Council of five persons is a long step toward the establishment of a true constitutional government in China, which has been promised in the near future, and it is thought that this reform will reduce the probabilities of further insurrections throughout the Chinese Empire. The other very important event is the new Anglo-Chinese agreement for the immediate reduction and final extinction of the exportation of Indian opium to China which was signed the other day. This opium agreement between China and Britain became operative immediately. It provides that China shall annually diminish its production of opium proportionately with the Indian import until its extinction in 1917. Great Britain agrees that the importation of Indian opium to China shall cease earlier if the native production in that country ceases. The royal edicts of the Chinese government for the gradual abolition of the opium traffic and habit are doing their work singularly well. This governmental reform in the interest of political freedom and victory in the battle against opium in behalf of personal liberty is a new light God has sent to drive away the darkness of the night. The fulfilment of the divine plans and prophecies suggests to the apostle the light that ushers in the dawn that banishes the night.

We have also a more sure word of prophecy; whereunto ye do well that ye take heed, as unto a light that shineth in a dark place, until the day dawn. (II. Peter 1:19.)

New York Speaks to Denver

Telephone communication was opened up the other day between New York and Denver, 2,000 miles apart, and now any one in New York who desires may call "Hello, Denver!" and keep the wire three minutes if he has $11.25 with which to pay the toll. The longest distance for commercial telephone service heretofore has been 1,400 miles. Persons who tried the line said they heard the voice in Denver as distinctly as though it had been in Harlem or Brooklyn. It is predicted that in the near future New York and San Francisco will be talking to each other over the phone. Any one who has looked into the mystery of wireless telegraphy or telephonic communication need not have much difficulty in believing in the intimate communication between God and his children through the privilege of prayer. However far heaven, God's home, may be away from us, either beyond the stars or between us and them, his children can speak to him and hear his voice in return.

But thou, when thou prayest, enter into thy closet, and when thou hast shut the door, pray to thy Father which is in secret; and thy Father which seeth in secret shall reward thee openly. (Matt. 6:6.)

JUAREZ FALLS AFTER HOT FIGHT

Carrying the Wounded to the American Side for Treatment, After the Battle

THE sudden termination of peace negotiations between the revolutionists and the Diaz government in Mexico on May 6 was followed by the greatest battle which has yet taken place in the war. On Sunday a small body of General Madero's troops was fired upon by the Federals in the city of Juarez. The insurrectos returned the attack with such success that they were able to gain a footing on the outskirts of the city. As this aggression had been carried on without orders from General Madero he commanded that those who had captured the Federal trenches should retire. The men, realizing the value of their position, questioned the order and asked that it be reconsidered and a general attack ordered. This gave rise to dispatches which stated that Madero had lost control of his forces. The decision finally turned on a report which was made to the general on behalf of the detachment in the town. They declared that they felt they could not abandon the positions they had gained legitimately, although they were completely loyal to General Madero. The pressure from the army became too great for General Madero to resist, so at midnight he gave the order for a general attack in the morning. In the morning General Navarro, the Federal commander in the city, was called on the telephone and a final attempt made to induce him to surrender. This he refused to do.

Firing could be heard inside and outside the city at times all during the night. The little force of rebels that had gained important points in the first day's fighting—said to have numbered about 300—was on the alert to prevent surprise, and occasionally fired upon suspicious bodies of men. Some of the rebel outposts also drove in outlying Federals.

The real fighting began at dawn. By this time the main rebel army had been disposed to the south and west of the city and was merely awaiting the signal to make the rush. A squad of insurrectos had taken up a position in an adobe house, and it was under their guard and that of other rebels stationed along the river bank that a large portion of the rebel force was able to get into the city for the later fighting.

It was 4.30 when the general assault began. The few rebel guns had opened on the city preparing the way. Then out of the trenches along the whole rebel front squads of men emerged, dropped to the ground and fired, jumped and ran a short distance, dropped and wormed along, fired, ran again, and came closer and closer. From the outlying trenches, from the houses, whose roofs had been fortified with sandbags, from every other cover, the Federals sent a shower of bullets on the advancing foes. General Navarro had two modern field guns, other older cannon, and twelve machine guns, and shells and shrapnel were sent by the artillery at the advancing squads.

The advance of the rebels was steady. They withheld their fire whenever possible in order to save ammunition. Their sharpshooters seemed to inflict large damage on the Federals. The forenoon was not far gone before they had driven the enemy from the trenches and were gaining positions within the city. Once that was accomplished the houses became forts. Rebels and Federals took refuge in them and fired upon every one in sight. The rebels continued their rushing tactics and slowly carried the fight into the centre of the city. Prominent in the advance on the march through the city was the American Legion, commanded by Colonel Garibaldi, descendant of the great Italian warrior. In this legion were many former soldiers, not only of the American Army but of Canadian and European training. It was part of this contingent that led the way into Juarez. They were not always in the front, however, for they found themselves racing with detachments of the native rebels.

The objectives of these advances were the Federal barracks, the custom house, the post office and the Church of Guadalupe, which General Navarro's troops had converted into a fort. In the middle of the afternoon the attacking forces set fire to the post office and the flames spread to buildings near the church where the Federals were gathered. As the fire grew and sent up great volumes of smoke, the revolutionist reserves under Colonel Blanco came over the hills near the city. The smoke became so dense as to render the Federal firing ineffective and to permit the insurrectos under General Orozco and Colonel Garibaldi to surround the church. At seven o'clock a truce was agreed upon so that the dead and wounded might be removed and cared for. Many of these were brought to the United States side of the border and are being tended by the soldiers at El Paso.

The rebel success which really decided the fate of the city was accomplished soon after midnight, when the Church of Guadalupe, where General Navarro had hoped to hold out until General Rabago could come to his relief, was captured. This work was accomplished largely by the band of Colonel Blanco. The way to the church was made through the jail near by. A dynamite bomb was exploded under one of the walls of the prison, and tore a great hole through which the insurrectos entered.

Blanco's men battered down doors with dynamite and rushed into the building. They fought their way through the auditorium, and finally up into the tower and on to the roof, which had been fortified with sand bags. Some of the Federals were captured and others retreated. It was here that the field guns and some of the machine guns and a store of ammunition fell into the hands of the rebels. It was the work of a short time to clear the Federals away from the municipal buildings, and send them to the southeast.

The next morning the Federals were gradually driven back from their various strongholds till the remainder was gathered in the barracks, and completely surrounded by the insurrectos. The rebel artillery, together with that captured during the previous day, was brought up and, when General Navarro refused to surrender, was ordered to batter down the building.

Insurrectos by the hundreds occupied the houses within one hundred yards on every side. Shrapnel was poured into the hollow square of the barracks. The soldiers crowded the place to its capacity. Only a few loopholes from which to shoot at the insurrectos pierced its sides. Finally General Navarro hoisted a white flag. The gray-haired general stood in the doorway of the barracks and received Colonel Garibaldi. His eyes dimmed as he gave up his sword, but Colonel Garibaldi, with a handshake that bespoke his admiration for the brave fight the Federal leader had made, assured him of the desire of the rebels to afford him every courtesy. A score of rebel officers rode up and extended to the Federal commander their sympathy as Mexicans for him and his men.

After the surrender General Madero addressed the prisoners who were confined in a corral.

"You fought for General Diaz," he said at the conclusion of his speech, "because you had to, because you were a part of that system which we are trying to dissolve. In a few days perhaps peace will be restored. You will soon be free. If the war is to be continued you can have your choice of being paroled or joining the army of liberation. In the meantime we shall treat you as brothers, not as foes."

General Navarro and his twenty-seven officers were paroled by General Madero. After inviting them to dinner, he announced that if they would promise on their honor not to leave the city they could have the liberty of the town. They agreed to do so and went to their own quarters to sleep that night. A conservative estimate of physicians and those who watched the fighting puts the Federal dead at fifty and the insurrecto loss at fifteen, with a total of about 250 wounded on both sides.

RECONCILIATION

MEMORIAL DAY --- 1911

By Alfred R. Calhoun

I'M getting bowed and I've long been gray,
O friend from our Southern land,
But a voice from the past thrills my soul today,
At the clasp of your strong, brown hand;
Many years have passed since you and I met,
Though it seems scarce a day to me,
Since we buried our dead, with the battle rain wet,
On that hill by the Tennessee.

A bugler in gray came down to the shore,
And signalled a truce to the blue;
Two captains rode out, 'mid the wrack and the gore,—
I was one, and the other was you;
We met 'neath a tree, where two young soldiers lay;
We shouted, but they gave no sign;
The one was your brother, who'd fall'n in the fray,—
The other was brother of mine.

There, under that oak, we made them one grave,
And your eyes and my eyes were damp,
As we cut in the bark: "They were foemen and brave!"
Then each turned and rode back to his camp.
Like true men you fought, till fighting was vain,
For those who drew sword on your side,
But I've prayed since that day to meet you again,
And to talk of our brothers who died.

To talk of the hunger, the march, and the strife,
Of the snows and the summers' fierce heat,
And to say: "We are stronger for knowing that life,
Though mine was success, yours defeat."
But a truce, a truce we forever must keep,
Has come for you and for me;
We are brothers at heart, through the brothers who sleep
On that hill by the Tennessee.

OVER 1,000 MEN WON TO CHRIST

MEN'S PERSONAL WORK LEAGUE FOUNDED BY EVANGELIST SUNDAY AT YOUNGSTOWN, OHIO

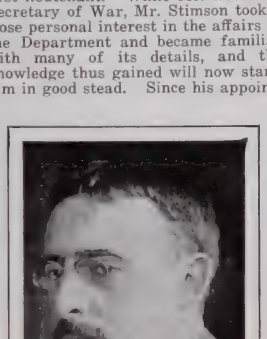
THE Men's Personal Work League of the Youngstown, Ohio, Young Men's Christian Association is the direct outcome of the great revival held in Youngstown during the months of January and February last year by Rev. William A. Sunday. At all of Evangelist Sunday's revival meetings, a temporary organization is effected to carry on personal work for men during the six weeks' meetings. It remained for Youngstown to see the great advantage of making this temporary organization permanent.

On February 23, 1910, the men who were in direct contact with the work of the revival met at the Young Men's Christian Association and effected a permanent organization. The membership started with 115 men, and on February 23, 1911, 1,250 men were enrolled under the "Banner of Jesus Christ," doing personal work every day. The Men's Personal Work League, from its inception up to February 23 last, has held over 500 meetings with an approximate attendance of over 100,000, and over 1,000 conversions!

These meetings open with fifteen minutes of song service. About ten minutes are then taken up in announcements; a word by the chairman on the work of the League, followed by songs, after which sentence prayers are given, the men always praying in short, definite prayers for those immediate things that are on their hearts. Then comes another song, which is followed by testimonies. It is an inspiration for one to listen to the men (between 500 and 600 strong) giving their testimony in such an honest, definite, forceful manner. It is a common event, at these Sunday afternoon meetings, to have twelve to twenty men start life anew.

When one considers that there are over twelve hundred men carrying on Personal Work, not only at the meetings, but during the week, talking with their fellow-men on the streets, in the shops, mills, offices, stores and wherever they may be, striving to carry the word of Christ to those about them, it is easy to understand the great results that are produced.

The League is undenominational and democratic, bringing men into closer contact and relationship with one another. The meetings held outside of the Association in and around the city of Youngstown are always entirely undenominational, so that any one coming forward feels entirely free to become a member of any church he may select. At these meetings one sees and feels the entire independence of the men. The speakers, chairman and co-workers are from all walks of life. Men in the professions and laborers work side by side with that one great object in their hearts which is the League's motto, "To bring men to a closer knowledge of the love and saving power of Jesus Christ."



It is a year since the revival closed in Youngstown. To those who have watched the progress of the work, it is a stimulating revelation that the spiritual enthusiasm has been kept alive all these months and is still growing.

AN IMPORTANT CABINET CHANGE

ON MAY 12, public announcement was made by the President of the resignation of Hon. Jacob M. Dickinson, Secretary of War, and simultaneously, the appointment of Henry Lewis Stimson of New York, as Secretary Dickinson's successor. Although the news was somewhat of a surprise to the general public, the resignation of Secretary Dickinson had been in the hands of the President since April 28. In his letter of resignation, the Secretary stated that private business affairs connected with his estate in Tennessee are in a condition that demands his personal attention. It is understood that he has interests in real lands to which he must devote himself in order to avert considerable losses. This was fully explained to President Taft, who in his letter accepting the resignation expressed his appreciation of the reason and paid a high compliment to Secretary Dickinson's administration of his department.

The appointment of Mr. Stimson as Secretary of War is understood to have been made at the suggestion of Senator Elihu Root of New York. Mr. Stimson was the Republican candidate in the last gubernatorial election in New York State, which was carried by the Democrats, electing Governor Dix. He is a warm friend of ex-President Roosevelt, who appointed him United States District Attorney when he was Mr. Root's law partner and who worked hard for his nomination at Saratoga. Both as a lawyer and as a public official, he has made an enviable record.

The new Secretary of War is a native of New York City, where he was born in 1867. He was educated at Yale, and took a course in Harvard Law School and was admitted to the bar in 1891. He has conducted many important cases and is regarded as one of the leading lawyers in this country. He was for nine years a member of Troop A., National Guard, beginning as a private and rising to first lieutenant. While Mr. Root was Secretary of War, Mr. Stimson took a close personal interest in the affairs of the Department and became familiar with many of its details, and the knowledge thus gained will now stand him in good stead. Since his appointment he has received scores of telegrams of congratulation, including messages from Colonel Roosevelt, Secretary MacVeagh and former Secretary Garfield. His first meeting with President Taft after notification of his appointment was at a reception in Newark, N. J., on May 13, when the President gave him a cordial welcome to the Cabinet family. His appointment gives New York two members of the Cabinet, Attorney-General Wickersham being the other Cabinet official from that State.

words, "We want this crown." The banner of the millinery section bore a hat with waving plumes. That of the dressmakers was illustrated with a sewing-machine.

The beloved President of the National Society, the Rev. Anna Howard Shaw, led the College Women's League, and was saluted with cheers along the line. The caps and gowns of the college women formed a picturesque feature. So did the red head-bands of the Athletic Club Girls, who also carried racquets. Two pretty young girls in blue and white bore the standard of the Equal Franchise Society, 100 of whom mustered for the fray.

Among the many very beautiful women in the parade, young and old, were Miss Inez Milholland, Mrs. W. W. Penfield, Mrs. James Lees Laidlaw, Mrs. Harriet Stanton Blatch, Mrs. Nora Blatch de Forest, Mrs. John Winters Brannan and Mrs. Frederick Nathan.

The New York Times has been among the most pronounced opponents of woman suffrage, but in its issue for May 9, it said editorially: "The parade was not in itself an argument for woman suffrage, but the efficiency with which the affair was managed, its size and dignity—these were, in a way, arguments of considerable force."

Sunk in Crash at Sea

EARLY on the morning of May 12, the steamer Merida, of the Ward Line, bound from Havana, Cuba, for New York, sank in thirty-five fathoms of water, fifty miles northeast of Cape Charles. The Merida was feeling her way through a dense fog when she was rammed by the steamer Admiral Farragut, bound from Philadelphia in ballast for Port Antonio, Jamaica, to take on a cargo of bananas.

All of the 319 persons on the Merida were safely transferred to the Admiral Farragut, and only one was at all seriously injured. The Merida, which is a much larger ship than her destroyer, the Admiral Farragut, was struck just after midnight, and only five hours later she was resting at the bottom of the Atlantic.

The bow of the smaller ship crashed into the side of the Merida and disabled the latter's engines, wrecked her electrical dynamo and wireless apparatus, and left her in total darkness. As the Admiral Farragut backed away it was found that she had entirely wrecked her bow and was being floated by her water-tight bulkheads. The first wireless call at 5.30 A.M. was heard by the United States battleship Iowa and the Old Dominion liner Hamilton.

At eight o'clock the Hamilton arrived, and, lowering her lifeboats, took on board the passengers and crew of the Merida, and sailed for Norfolk, Va., where they were cared for by the steamship company. The Iowa stood by to convoy the Farragut into port.

Though the lights on the Merida went out in less than ten minutes after the accident, and all the passengers were greatly frightened, there was no panic. The officers saw all safely trans-shipped before they themselves left the ship.

THE LITTLE HOPI INDIAN

An American Hero Tale

THE very best Indian hero tale we have heard for many a long day is the story of Tewanima, the opi Indian boy who in 69 minutes and seconds won the twelve-mile Marathon race in New York City on May 6. In many respects this race is the greatest in the history of boy athletics.

Tewanima Entered to Win

TEWANIMA, a keen-witted, modest Indian student at Carlisle College, ward of the nation nd a loyal scion of ne of the oldest tribes f aboriginal Americn Indians, entered ne race to win. It ever occurred to Teanima that anybody ould pass him on ourse. His boyish ead held high from art to finish, he paid ttle attention to comades, to judges, or to ne cheering crowds nat were first to applaud his clean, easy nning. Tewanima ad set out for the oal, twelve miles way. To reach that oal was his high-earted and sole aim, nd he reached it. here it is in a nutshell.

Tewanima, Famous Boy Runner

World champion in the ten to twenty mile class

To be sure, one thousand other boys ad, at the same moment, set out for ne same goal, and fifty per cent. of nem ran the full course, but to the en observer Tewanima was the cked man. And to Tewanima himlf victory was no surprise.

Tewanima the Pace-Maker

OON after the first mile and a half, the determined little Indian easily nd pluckily set the pace for the thouand well-trained schoolboys who had ntered the race, and as pluckily he icked up the lead whenever he seemed want it; until at last, three quarters f a mile from City Hall, over rough aving and cobble stones, with a smart print that had the ear-marks of lenty of power to spare, he picked up for good and ll, and breasted he tape a minute nd a half ahead f everybody. hen modestly he cknowledged the hunderous cheerng of the crowds nd accepted the rinner's trophy.

ten to Twenty Mile Champion

N little more than 69 mintes, Tewanima ad set new standrds in the athletc field, had added ignity to his race, nd established is own interational reputaion as the greatst ten to twenty nile cross-country runner in the world.

Tewanima's Secret

Everyone who knows anything about t acknowledges that the secret of Tevanima's success is this: He has no ad habits, he does not shirk work, he s a good all-round sport, and no matter what he undertakes, he goes into it heart and soul to win.

Hotfoot It

THE 487 winners in that race hotfooted it from end to end. I cannot resist driving this home to you boys (forgive me just this once): Hotfoot it all along the way. Life is not all a triumphal procession of applauding crowds and comrades and we cannot all be cup-winners, to be sure; but don't be a laggard in the race, and don't drop out. Buckle down to it. Be jolly good all-round American boys. The standard is high but you can make it. Run clean, run earnestly, run to win. Breast the tape, boys; it pays.

ON MEMORIAL DAY

AT all Army Posts and Naval Stations on Memorial Day, the Stars and Stripes will fly at half staff from sunrise until noon. Immediately before midday, the regimental band will play the National Hymn, and the Nation's salute of twenty-one guns will be fired off instantly at 12 M. At the conclusion of this tribute to American soldiers North and South and East and West, the flag will immediately be run up to full staff and will remain there till sunset.

Proper Respect for the Flag

IN running up your flag to half staff, remember it should first be hoisted to the top of the staff, then lowered to position; before lowering from half staff, the flag should be first raised to full staff.

Let Old Glory, with its inspiring message, "In God is our Trust," fly from every schoolhouse and village church, and from home windows and lawns on Memorial Day.

If you do not happen to have your own flag to fly in honor of the soldiers whose memory the nation holds sacred, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will stand by you for one. See page 518.

Advertising has been a factor—an important factor—in the success of Ivory Soap.

But—would you buy Ivory Soap if you could get better soap for the price you pay for Ivory? No!

Would you buy Ivory Soap if you could get another soap, as good as Ivory, for less than you pay for Ivory? Of course not.

Advertising is merely an evidence of a manufacturer's faith in the merit of an article.

Continuous advertising is proof of the public's confidence in it.

Ivory Soap has been advertised, continuously, for more than thirty years.

For bath, toilet and fine laundry purposes; for the nursery; for shampooing; for everything and anything that necessitates the use of a better-than-ordinary soap, Ivory Soap is unequalled.

Good-Night Verse

If you see a tall fellow ahead of a crowd,
A leader of men marching fearless and proud,
And you know of a tale whose mere telling aloud,
Would cause his proud head to in anguish be bowed,
It's a pretty good plan to forget it.

Lovingly and faithfully,

The Aunt in the Cozy Corner

MEMORIAL DAY

By Beth Howland

In the golden morning light
Let us scatter blossoms bright,
Where Old Glory gently waves
O'er the soldiers' grass-grown graves.

On the waters flowing past
Flowery garlands let us cast,
That honored may the memory be
Of heroes sleeping 'neath the sea.

'Twas for us that, in the strife,
Each one freely gave his life;
Pluck the fairest blooms of May
When we keep Memorial Day.

OUR COMFORT CORNER

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

About Living Peaceably

THERE is a verse in St. Paul's Epistle to the Romans which has the ring of a marching order. "As much as lieth in you, live peaceably with all men." Read it with the emphasis placed on the pronoun: "As much as lieth in you, live peaceably." There are occasions when living peaceably even at home seems to be the hardest task that can be set before the ordinary person. Most of us are fond of having our own way; few of us enjoy having to set aside our way in little things for the accommodation of other people. Strife and friction at home, in church, and in the usual intercourse of everyday life are oftener caused by trifles in dispute than by differences of opinion concerning larger issues. One word brings on another, ill temper is awakened and discord mars what should be music sweet and harmonious, all because there is insistence about a trivial matter which might as well be dropped. Julia has one impression and Caroline another; both sisters have strong wills and are accustomed to speak with decision. Neither will concede an inch, and the result is unhappiness for both and disturbance and unrest in the atmosphere of the family. Sometimes a cloud hangs over a household, and its effect is so chilling that outsiders crossing the threshold are aware of discomfort. Sometimes the feeling in a home where all should be tranquil is not unlike that of a brooding thunderstorm. Occasionally a whole class in school is at odds. Sides are taken by opposing cliques. There is a leader here and another there, and the jarring of sentiment makes for lowered attainments in study and foolish waste of time. All this would never exist were each individual hourly to determine that the rule of life must be to live peaceably, and that so far as individual responsibility went peace should prevail. As much as lieth in you, John, Benjamin and Harold, cease from strife, look at the comfort of your neighbor rather than at your own convenience, and contribute to the joy of the community.

YEARS ago a man did something extremely mean and cruel to another. Whatever the act was, it had resulted in the other man's illness and death; and although no legal infraction could be traced to the survivor in the quarrel, the grudge had not been settled nor the flame of the feud quenched. The spirit of hate had lasted over a long period of time. It was borne in upon me then that forgiveness is a divine quality, and that the Master knew human nature well when he said that an offense should be forgiven indefinitely. "Master, how many times shall my brother sin against me and I forgive him? until seven times?" Jesus answered, "Not until seven times, but until seventy times seven."

TO BE sure, in home life exasperation and irritation seldom go farther than into the realm of slight disagreements, ironical remarks that sting and prick, personal allusions that are unfortunate, and little stabs that make only surface wounds. Yet this is undignified and in a measure shameful. It is beneath the standard that Christians should set for themselves, to live in perpetual squabbles and "amid scenes of confusion and creature complaints." Speaking of a family who possess extraordinary gifts, more than one of them being an acknowledged genius, an acquaintance said: "Those people are charming when you meet them in society, but in their home life each acts upon the other like a blister. They never make concessions, and half the time they are not on speaking terms. As for servants, they cannot keep them, and in the kitchen there is continual revolt." This family needed one by one to consider the beautiful Scriptural injunction, "As much as lieth in you live peaceably." A good rule and a safe one is never to insist on saying the final word. In a majority of instances silence is golden and whoever has sufficient self-control to maintain quietness will hold the key to the situation and insure domestic harmony. That which applies to home life is of equal application and suitability to school boards, committee meetings, church conferences and conventions in general.

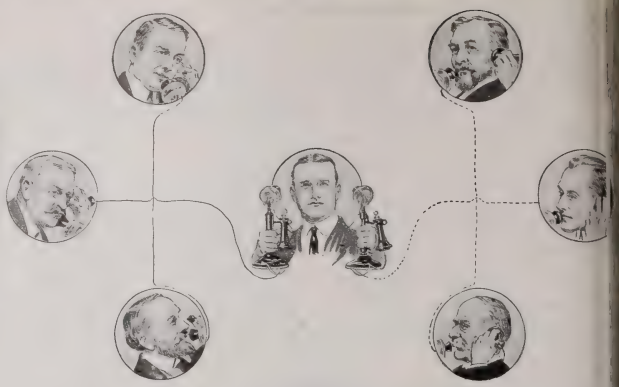
A Problem to Be Solved

"I HAVE been engaged for three years to a man whom I love and who loves me. A year ago my father died, leaving my mother and me alone in our home. My mother wishes me to remain at home after my marriage, or else inclines to closing her home and coming to live in mine. I am an only child and cannot bear the thought of deserting my mother in her desolation, but here is an unexpected line in the way: My future husband declares that he will not become a member of my mother's home or allow her to live with us in ours. I do not know what to do. Shall I break my engagement? Has my fiancé a stronger claim on me than the mother who has loved me all my life?

"BERTHA B."

The question is open for discussion. What counsel shall be given this young woman who stands at the parting of the ways in a position of peculiar difficulty and delicacy? Which should yield, the mother or the future husband? In what way shall this young woman decide so as to insure her future happiness?

Hints for the Discouraged



EVERY mail brings advice and encouragement to the couple whose situation has moved the sympathy of the big CHRISTIAN HERALD Family. I am selecting from a budget a number of hints that may be useful to them not only, but to others who are finding that they have a hard row to hoe.

"I would say to Ed and his wife to forget as far as possible the past and start to climb again. They can do it if they will. Their past success proves it. The experience of the past has been a dear one, but heaven will be the brighter if the reverse is taken in the right spirit."

"A man in our village suddenly lost his position. He took the first thing that offered itself, which was selling fruit and vegetables in the street. The contrast with what he had formerly done was very marked, but every one admired his pluck and energy. Some men give up in misfortune and let their wives support them. The more manly plan is to get up and hustle. Health, happiness and prosperity lie before the brave who refuse to stay down, even if they fall."

"Count your blessings, not your losses. Stick close to Jesus all the way. Have faith in God; seek his guidance for temporal as well as spiritual needs. Go to work; do your best, and he will be with you to own and to bless. Some day you will understand

Half Service or Double Expense

TWO telephone systems in one town mean a divided community or a forced duplication of apparatus and expense.

Some of the people are connected with one system, some are connected with the other system; and each group receives partial service.

Only those receive full service who subscribe for the telephones of both systems.

Neither system can ful meet the needs of the publi any more than a single syste could meet the needs of th public if cut in two and ha the telephones discontinued.

What is true of a sing community is true of the cour try at large.

The Bell System is estab lished on the princip of one system and on policy, to meet the de mands for universa service, a whole servic for all the people.

The Holding of Personal Rights

Robert Louis Stevenson's wonder- ul story, Kidnapped, there is an illustration of the ill that is wrought by weakly abandoning one's personal rights. Two brothers, Alexander and Ebenezer Balfour, started in youth with an equal chance of happiness. Unfortunately, both set their hearts on the same girl, and Alexander, the elder and more unselfish brother, in his eager desire to save the younger from misery, first offered to give up his sweetheart and next, she being wiser than he, and refusing to be given away to the man she did not love, married her and gave Ebenezer the estate. In due time Ebenezer degenerated into a mean, unfriendly and unfriended miser, capable of almost any crime and shunned by every one. Mr. Rankeillor, the lawyer, after relating the story to Alexander's son, David, summed the whole transaction up by saying that in this world people do very much better if they claim and hold the rights that legally belong to them.

This little homily is not intended to be a comfort to any one who is aware in candid moments of a tendency to selfishness. We do not all need to be warned against the defect of being too obliging.

Shine Any and Everywhere

WE DON'T have to live in a beautiful house, wear fine clothes or be counted a millionaire to shine, but we do need Christ in our hearts. If he lives with us we are bound to shine.

There was an aged woman living in the slums. She was old and poor, and lived in a basement room. The only light she had was through a transom window. Those who visited her almost forgot the room was so dark, the dear soul was so happy. Why was it? Because Jesus lived with her in that little dark room. She was one of God's stars.

Some of God's children have gone to the darkest and hardest corners of the earth, carrying salvation light to those who live in spiritual darkness. The world did not see them, but God did, and watched their patient faithful service, and he counted them his stars.

CAN any one supply the remainder of this poem? Our friend who sends it has only the first stanza:

Weary and spent and fainting,
For bitter had been the day,
And rough the road I had traveled,
At the foot of the cross I lay.

The Meaning of "Gold-Filled"

BY far the greater number of men and women who buy gold watches choose a gold-filled case.

Gold-filled means two layers of solid gold stiffened with a layer of metal alloy between. It makes a firmer case than solid gold, and it costs much less.

If the two plates of gold are heavy enough they will wear a lifetime. But you see the temptation to irresponsible manufacturers to roll the gold layers to a mere film and increase the center layer of base metal.

What is worse, the maker of the shoddy filled case can stamp it "Guaranteed for 20 years" or "Guaranteed for 25 years," and there is no law to prevent him.

A good many jewelers buy and sell by the guarantee.

Remember when you buy your watch to inquire about the case. Remember, also, that the guarantee stamp is no safe guide.

Fortunately, there is a way you can protect yourself—a way you can be absolutely sure of wearing qualities. Demand a filled case made by the people who make the finest solid gold cases in the world. That means a "Crescent Filled Case" or a "Jas. Boss Filled Case"—both made by the Keystone people, who produce the Keystone Solid Gold Watch Cases.

If you want to be doubly sure, don't trust your memory—cut these trade-marks out of the magazine and take them with you to the jeweler.

These marks are standard with the fine jewelry trade, and have been for 50 years.

REUBEN'S TRIBUTE

By ADELE BROWN

REUBEN HENSHAW chewed a bit of oat straw ruminantly as he sat in his barn door one morning in May. It was an unusually warm morning for May. Already the cherry blossoms were sending down their white shower of petals. A phœbe bird called its name plaintively from the hitching-post beside the woodshed door, jerking its long tail and tipping its head from side to side as it watched for insects to carry to the patient little mate on the nest in the woodshed. The farm looked beautiful to Reuben this morning. He loved every apple tree just bursting into bloom, every blade of tender green springing in the wide mowings. The lilacs and flowering almonds in the yard were his delight, while the hum of the honey-bees busy in the fragrant blossoms of the tall locust trees filled him with drowsy content.

In the opposite corner of the barn door sat the chairman of the selectmen of the village. He had just paid Reuben what the farmer considered a wonderful compliment.

"Of course," said Reuben, "I expect to be present at the exercises that day. 'Tain't often this town has a centennial, and I ain't likely to see another," smiling whimsically. "When I heerd the Guv'nor was comin' I was more'n anxious to go, 'cause he's got a name like an old friend of mine—nicest boy you ever see—shot 'way back in '64 in a skirmish—same night I got this hole in my leg. I kinder think the Guv'nor may be some kin of his'n. Maybe I'll have a chance to get speech with him."

"Sure you will, Mr. Henshaw. I'm going to see that all the speakers are introduced to him, and as many of the other folks as I can manage. You see, Mr. Henshaw, as you are the last of the veterans, I think it is particularly appropriate for you to give a history of the boys who went out with you in '61. Our town made quite a showing at that time, I believe."

"Yes, sir," said Reuben, "quite a showin'—quite a showin'. We felt pretty smart when we marched away, fifteen on us, men and boys. The village ain't very big, but the families was bigger then. I don't believe you could scare up fifteen for such a cause now. There wasn't but eight on 'em come back; and I'm the last o' the eight. Well, I thank ye kindly, Mr. Whitney," as he rose to go; "I'll do my best, though I ain't a public speaker, ye know."

"We don't care for oratory, Mr. Henshaw. We want plain facts, and you'll give us those. Good morning."

Long after Mr. Whitney's top buggy had disappeared over the crest of the hill, Reuben sat in the barn door and mused. In imagination he was back in the autumn morning long ago, when the fifteen volunteers of the little village marched away. How gay they were, or pretended to be! The maple trees had spread a flaunting carpet of scarlet and gold for their feet. The leaves rustled merrily as they marched, heads up, faces front. The girls waved and cheered, but the mothers knew and hid their faces. He could see his mother's white face now. She had sent her all—husband and three sons. "Oh, people could talk of the pomp and panoply of war; but how about the mothers, the sweethearts and wives who stayed at home?" he thought a little bitterly. Then he smiled, as he recalled Samantha's face that morning, round and rosy, with a wealth of curls on either side, and blue eyes meeting his eyes shyly. She had pressed a small package in his hand when he went to say good-by the evening before. He waved his thanks as he passed her in the crowd. Dear little daguerreotype! he had it still, faded but beautiful to him. He must go and tell her about Mr. Whitney's compliment. She would be glad to know. Samantha was always glad when honors came to him.

Rising somewhat stiffly he limped to the house. The wound in his leg had always troubled him somewhat. "But," he would say, "it might hev been wuss; I've got the leg anyway, and it's better than a wooden peg."

As he reached the kitchen doör, Samantha came down the steps to help him. Putting her hand under his arm she said:

"Why, father, I didn't know but I'd have to come and get you. Thought you'd fallen asleep."

"I was dreamin', ma, but I wasn't asleep. I was way back in war time. Al Whitney was here this mornin' to get me to make a speech at the Centennial. 'A Tribute to Our Boys of '61' he said I was to call it. But I ain't goin' to put no such high-flyin' title as that on it. If they want an account of how our boys fit and suffered and died, I can give it. I know how they held together at Cedar Mountain and Antietam, who went down at Fredericksburg and Spottsylvania; and if they want an account of Andersonville Prison, why, I guess bein' an eye-witness for more 'n six months qualifies me to give it."

"That's so, father; no one can do it better. But won't you be afraid talkin' before the Guv'nor and so many folks?"

Reuben laughed softly. "Now, mother! the Guv'nor ain't a day older than our little Tom would have been. And just like 's not Tom would have been Guv'nor if he had have lived. No, I ain't a mite scared. I'm glad the Lord spared me to do it for the boys. There wan't a slouch among the whole fifteen. I know some as went from other towns and never heerd a gun fired. But 'twan't so with our boys. They was in the thick on't from the very beginnin', and they kept in the thick on't. I'll tell the history good and true."

Joe, the hired man, had double work for several days after Mr. Whitney's visit; for Reuben spent many hours at the old desk in the sitting-room, writing his manuscript laboriously. In his pocket he carried a pencil and pad. Joe had many a sly laugh over his use of them; for no matter what he was doing, planting, milking, or whatever, if a thought struck him, out came the pad and he jotted it down.

At last the great day dawned, bright and clear. Preparations had been going on for several days in the village. The hotel and post office were gorgeous in flags and bunting. Flags floated from many house windows. At one end of the Common a huge tent had been erected, and there the speaking would take place. The church organ had been placed in front of the rostrum, and a choir of village boys and girls drilled for the occasion. The band from Upper Hallam had volunteered their services. In front of the hotel was placed a dining-tent to accommodate the overflow. The village was astir early, and long before ten o'clock, the hour set for the exercises to begin, the church sheds were filled with horses, carriages, express wagons and farm wagons, while a long line of nondescript vehicles, with often indifferent locomotive power, lined the fences. Purveyors of badges and postal cards wandered up and down and the toy balloon man arrived early. The entire township had poured its full measure of enthusiasm into the village; and in the home gatherings were brought together for the first time sons and daughters who had turned their backs on the village for wider horizons years before.

Reuben and Samantha were stirring before "sun-up." Reuben didn't want to be hurried, he said. The chores were done, breakfast eaten and cleared

Can't Get Away From It

Is it possible to nourish, strengthen and Rebuild the Brain by Food?

Every man who thinks uses up part of the brain each day. Why don't it all disappear and leave an empty skull in say a month of brain work? Because the man rebuilds each day.

If he builds a little less than he destroys, brain fag and nervous prostration result sure. If he builds back a little more each day, the brain grows stronger and more capable. That also is sure. Where does man get the material to rebuild his brain? Is it from air, sky or the ice of the Arctic sea? When you come to think about it, the rebuilding material must be in the food and drink.

That also is sure.

Are the brain rebuilding materials found in all food? In a good variety but not in suitable proportion in all.

To illustrate: we know bones are made largely of lime and magnesia taken from food; therefore to make healthy bone structure we must have food containing these things. We would hardly feed only sugar and fat to make healthy bone structure in a growing child.

Likewise if we would feed in a skilful manner to insure getting what the brain requires for strength and rebuilding, we must first know what the brain is composed of and then select some article or articles (there are more than one) that contain these elements.

Analysis of brain by an unquestionable authority, Geoghegan, shows of Mineral Salts, Phosphoric Acid and Potash combined (Phosphate of Potash) 2.91 per cent of the total, 5.33 of all mineral salts.

This is over one-half.

Beaunis, another authority, shows "Phosphoric Acid combined" and Potash 73.44 per cent from a total of 101.07.

Considerable more than one-half of Phosphate of Potash.

Analysis of Grape-Nuts shows: Potassium and phosphorus (which join and make Phosphate of Potash) is considerable more than one-half of all the mineral salts in the food.

Dr. Geo. W. Carey, an authority on the constituent elements of the body says: "The gray matter of the brain is controlled entirely by the inorganic cell-salt, Potassium Phosphate (Phosphate of Potash). This salt unites with albumen and by the addition of oxygen creates nerve fluid or the gray matter of the brain. Of course, there is a trace of other salts and other organic matter in nerve fluid but Potassium Phosphate is the cl factor and has the power within self to attract, by its own law affinity, all things needed to ma facture the elixir of life."

Further on he says: "The beg ning and end of the matter is supply the lacking principle, and molecular form, exactly as nat furnishes it in vegetables, fruits a grain. To supply deficiencies this is the only law of cure."

The natural conclusion is tha Phosphate of Potash is the nee mineral element in brain and y use food which does not contain you have brain fag because its da loss is not supplied.

On the contrary, if you eat fo known to be rich in this eleme you place before the life forces t which nature demands for bra building.

Mind does not work well on brain that is broken down by la of nourishment.

A peaceful and evenly pois mind is necessary to good digestio

Worry, anxiety, fear, hate, et etc., directly interfere with or st the flow of Ptyalin, the digesti juice of the mouth, and also int fere with the flow of the digesti juices of stomach and pancreas.

Therefore, the mental state the individual has much to do (mo than suspected) with digestion.

Brain is made of Phosphate Potash as the principal Miner Salt, added to albumen and wat

Grape-Nuts contain that eleme as more than one-half of all i mineral salts.

A healthy brain is important, one would "do things" in th world.

A man who sneers at "Mind sneers at the best and least unde stood part of himself. That pa which some folks believe links u to the Infinite.

Mind asks for a healthy bra upon which to act, and Nature h defined a way to make a health brain and renew it day by day as is used up from work of the previou day.

Nature's way to rebuild is t the use of food which supplies th things required. Brain rebuildin material is certainly found in ir volunteers whom your speaker has overlooked. I have a father—he is here to-day—who was also a volunteer in '61. In Washington he met a boy from his own State. They became chums and tentmates. They were together in many a hard-fought battle. Many a night they lay in the trenches or marched weary miles in each other's company. One night—my father tells the story with loving remembrance—your soldier boy did picket duty. It was cold and wet. Next day the march was a hard one, through the mud of a country road. My father was not well. When after plodding wearily for many miles a halt was called, and camp made, he was assigned to picket duty. He was very tired, too tired to keep awake, and so your boy volunteered to serve in his stead. Your boy had served the night before. He had marched as far as my father, but he accepted the duty to spare his friend. Can you not see him as he trudges painfully back and forth on his post?"

"There was another night"—the Governor's voice was quiet now and all was very still—"a small detachment of the Fifth was surprised by the enemy. In the skirmish that followed, my father was shot."

Reuben's mouth had fallen open. "I know't; wasn't I there to see? But he was killed," he murmured.

"His chum," continued the Governor, "seeing his comrade fall, dashed in amid a rain of bullets thick as hail, and dragged the senseless body to a place of safety, then disappeared."

"Grays ketched me," muttered Reuben.

"When my father recovered consciousness he was in a field hospital of the Christian Commission. There he learned of his friend's part in that night attack. Search was made; but all effort to find that friend proved unavailing, and he was given up for dead. When my father recovered, minus his right arm, he received an honorable discharge, and returned home. Later he left his home and went to Vermont. I learned to-day that his old comrade is still alive. I have listened with interest to the glowing tribute your speaker has paid to the volunteers of this village. But he has been too modest. Some of the bravest deeds he has left unrecorded. So I take pleasure in giving my inadequate testimony to the bravery and kindness of your neighbor and my father's comrade, Reuben Henshaw."

There was not a sound to be heard as the Governor turned and clasped Reuben's hands in both his own. The old man's eyes were full of tears, and his voice trembling as he asked eagerly, "Is Tom alive? is Tom alive?"

"Yes," returned the Governor, "not only alive, but here. He came with me to-day because it was to your town I was coming."

The crowd had been quiet long enough and now broke into tumultuous applause.

Down through the aisle another old man was coming, gray, bent, his right sleeve hanging empty. Making his way through the curious applauding throng he reached the platform, while the Governor, still holding Reuben's hand, stepped forward to meet him. One look into each other's eyes, and the two old comrades clasped hands with a cry of "Reuben!" "Tom!" Then their trembling voices failed and their eyes overflowed.

Samantha laid a timid hand on that of her neighbor.

"I'm afraid father can't stand it," she said anxiously. "I must go and get him."

Shouldering her way to the platform, she caught Reuben's coat. "Come, father," she said. "You and Mr. Duffield come outside with me. I'm 'fraid you can't stand it." And so, led by Samantha, they passed out into the sunlight.

GOD IS LOVE*

Sunday School Lesson by Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

THE book of Hosea is one of the so-called Minor Prophets, and is generally so little read that it might be spoken of as a by-path. Before the Uniform International Sunday School Lesson System, in the good (?) old days when every teacher followed his own preferences and selected his or her own lessons, the book of Hosea and those of the other minor prophets (twelve in all) were little known, and almost never used in the Sunday School. Happily the Uniform Lesson System gave us the study of the whole Bible. It will help us to realize what the Sunday School had missed when we read what Rev. Campbell Morgan says of the book of Hosea:

"There is no book in the Old Testament, perhaps none in the Bible, more clearly setting forth the fact of the love of God than this prophecy of Hosea. That love is celebrated as being mightier than all opposing forces, in that it is unquenched even by the unfaithfulness of his people. It is moreover clearly set forth as love which acts in severest punishment of sin, because sin causes the downfall and wounding of those upon whom love is set. Finally it reveals the fact that at last, through these very processes of severity, love triumphs in the conquest of the rebellious, and their return to the consciousness of love, and to conduct corresponding thereto."

In connection with this lesson, let us read the whole book of Hosea. It will not take more than forty minutes to read it slowly and thoughtfully. Its first thirteen chapters have by Dr. Joseph Parker been compared with "tempest, storm, whirlwind, cyclone, and great rage and tumult of all elements"; and he says of the last chapter—fourteenth (which is the portion of our lesson): "In this closing chapter we have light, peace, comfort, Gospel words, evangelical music, an easy and inviting slope, right up into heaven."

The Plea and the Response

Let us read verses one to three inclusive: After Hosea had forcibly brought the sins of the people before them: their drunkenness, their Sabbath breaking, their apostasy from God, their espousal of idolatry and idolaters, he begged them to return to God and godliness. Hence we have the plea. Read it carefully and slowly, praying for the guidance of the Spirit. When Hosea had thus pleaded with the people, he voiced the loving kindness of God.

Read verses four to eight. As we read the words which God gave Hosea to speak for him, we can but wonder at the quality of his mercy: he will love them "freely"; he will help them to be good and do good; all charges against them shall be removed; he will be to them even as the dew. Let us recall the sparkling beauty which the dew imparts to the grass and the flowers. It will help us to understand "the beauty of the Lord our God" resting upon those who serve him. "Let the beauty of the Lord our God be upon us" (Ps. 90: 17). Not only does the dew give beauty, but it helps growth. Those of us who have had gardens know this to be a fact.

God wanted his chosen people to grow strong in virtues which the heathen by whom they were surrounded did not possess. He compared what it was possible for them to be, with the purity of the lily, and the strength of the cedars of Lebanon, and the abounding fruitfulness of the olive tree, and with the sweet odor of pine when it is kissed by the sun. What more could God say to bless his people, if only they would turn from their wickedness? Hosea tried to bring the people to a realization of what God had said to them about what he had in store for them, and so we have the moral. Read it in verse 9.

Growing In Beauty

A heathen prince visiting London met the good old Dr. Marsh, and was so impressed that he said: "That good minister has such a beautiful face, I must learn about his religion and worship his God." It is not at all likely that Dr. Marsh was aware of his beautiful face; if he had been, it would have been spoiled. There is a close relation between the character and the face. The beauty of holiness is as imperishable as the God who gives it. Not only the face, but every part of the body—the step, the bearing, the lip, the glance—are moulded by the mind. The whole body is a tongue that tells on us. Each inward act makes its outward mark, and those desires and thoughts that most frequently recur cut their autographs most deeply in the flesh. Therefore, if we would be beautiful we must cultivate our soul-gardens and our heart-gardens. It has been said: "A man may smile and smile, and be a villain." It is true, he may; but his smile can seldom hide his sins as he means it should. There are those among men who can detect the writing of these things under the smiles. Little children seem to have a God-given instinct in these matters, and so they are apt to take either a sudden liking or a dislike to persons whom they meet.

There are many books published, and many hints are given in the newspapers about how beauty of body may be acquired; but the wisest hint of all was uttered by a preacher long ago: "If a man or woman wishes to realize the full power of personal beauty, it must be by cherishing noble hopes and purposes, by having something to do, and something to live for, which is worthy of humanity, which by expanding the capacities of the soul gives expansion and symmetry to the body which contains it."

Why was King David called beautiful? Because his young manhood, while he was yet a shepherd, was given to God. He could write even then, "The Lord is my Shepherd, I shall not want."

Some Beautiful Bible Women

Why was Esther called "fair and beautiful"? Because she had been brought up in the fear and love of God (Esther 2: 7), and because she dared to become the deliverer of her people.

Why was Abigail called beautiful? Because she was the wise wife of a wealthy and churlish man (I. Sam. 25).

Are we not quite sure that Hannah had a beautiful face? for she was the mother of Samuel, the child of her prayer.

The mother Eunice and the grandmother Lois—were not their faces beautiful as they taught the Holy Scripture to the child Timothy!

And what shall we say of the face of Mary, the mother of our Lord? For centuries artists have tried to paint it, but we have not yet seen one picture that fully represents her.

Once when we were visiting the poet Whittier in his home, he showed to us the portrait of his mother. We remarked upon its beauty. He replied: "They say all Quaker ladies are beautiful." This is true because they have the beauty of peace in their faces. A returned missionary who had lived many years in a heathen land, said that what impressed him most when he came back to America was not the stately buildings and electric cars, but

A Great Temperance Work

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD gladly prints the following appeal sent out by the National Temperance Society and Publication House, whose officers, well known to our readers, are: Rev. D. S. Dodge, D.D., President, Rev. C. H. Mead, D.D., Editor and Lecturer, and Hon. Oliver W. Stewart, Field Secretary. The following is their appeal:

"DEAR FRIEND: Two great battles are to be fought soon. Texas votes on State-wide prohibition in July. Shortly after, the voters of Maine are to face the question of the repeal of Maine's old-time prohibition policy. The men engaged in the liquor traffic will spare no expense to keep Texas out of the prohibition column, while hundreds of thousands of dollars will be spent to sweep Maine from her safe moorings. It is the combined money power of the liquor business in the nation arrayed against these States.

"Our comrades in Texas and Maine will make the best fight in their power, but they will battle against enormous odds. Have we any right to leave them to fight single-handed? If they lose, the reaction will hurt every city, town, village and hamlet in the land.

"They will not fail if we do what is in our power at this critical time. The National Temperance Society—the oldest national temperance organization in the country—proposes to help, and we seek your co-operation.

"It is our plan to put Oliver W. Stewart, our Field Secretary, whom you know, and who has been heard in all parts of the country, into the State of Texas for the last month before the election. We propose to send such other speakers and literature of a helpful character as our means will permit. As quickly as that fight is over, we will transfer Mr. Stewart to Maine, where again we will mass our speakers and will back them up with literature specially designed to meet the situation.

"To do all this we should have a campaign fund amounting at least to $10,000. Double that amount and even more can be used to good advantage. This can be made possible by the generous contributions of men and women outside of those States who believe in helping our friends and comrades when in such need of assistance.

"We are asking friends of the cause to assist in a special Texas and Maine campaign fund. We feel convinced that you and others will see the grave emergency that confronts the whole temperance reform and that you will respond with a prompt contribution.

"If we are to do this, plans must be perfected at once. We must begin months in advance and we cannot do so without means. The smallest contributions will be welcome, but we hope there are some who will send large remittances; every one should send something. At the close of the campaign, we will make a report to the contributors as to the amount raised and how expended. We are inviting you to put your name on a roll of honor.

"We are arranging a great appeal to the people of Maine not to go backward, but for the sake of the entire country to hold the ground they have. Enclosed you will find a blank which you can use in sending your gift, and which also will authorize us to sign your name to the appeal.

"The situation is critical. Much is at stake. We confidently expect a favorable reply.

"In behalf of the society, very truly yours, D. STUART DODGE,
"President."

Readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD who desire to send contributions to aid the National Temperance Society in this great battle in these two States, especially in the State of Maine, that it may retain its present law, may send contributions direct to the National Temperance Society, 3 East Fourteenth Street, New York City, or to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. We shall be glad to take charge of such a fund and pay it over promptly as contributions come in.

the beautiful old ladies. He said that heathen women grow ugly as they grow old.

Growing in Strength Like the Cedar

It is said that while a palm tree attains its height in a hundred years, the cedars of Lebanon have grown for thousands of years. The secret of this is the far reaching roots which make the tree immovable, no matter how the tempest rages. So nothing can move those whose hearts are stayed on God. They grow on and on, not only for thousands of years, but throughout eternity.

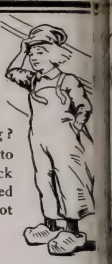
Grow like the Vine—in Fruitfulness

The Israelites whom Hosea reproved had been growing like a thistle, bringing as fruit only that which was evil. There are a lot of people growing just that way now. Let us examine ourselves. How different to grow like the vine, and bear luscious fruit which gladdens all who eat it! It is a law of nature that a thistle plant cannot be changed into a vine, but it is a law of grace that a sinner can be changed into a Christian, and his works become good instead of evil. Hosea was God's man to preach that truth to the Israelites, and it has been helping men and women in all the world ever since.

What kind of a God have we? One who is "ready to pardon, gracious and merciful." These are not the words of Hosea, but of Nehemiah, and they were spoken nearly three hundred years after Hosea had pleaded with Israel to give up their wickedness and serve their God. The people had gone on with their sinning, and God had gone on with his loving. He is the same God yesterday, to-day, and shall we say "forever"? "He will not always chide, neither will he keep his anger forever" (Ps. 103: 9).

Yet there is time, yet there is room, yet there is pardon for those who will follow him. The words spoken by Hosea more than twenty-six centuries ago are just as potent to-day as then. The knell "Too late!" has not yet rung out into the world, but instead the joyful sound is pealing, "Come unto me."

THE POWER OF PRAYER



THE alchemists in days of yore, in poverty and pain,
Undaunted by their loss and toil, all day they sought to gain,
And often through the weary nights, the knowledge of that power
That wise philosophers believed would change within an hour
All dross to gold. And thus they spent long weary years for naught,
But never found the glittering prize which eagerly they sought.

The poorest, weakest child of God who knows the power of prayer,
With faith and trust that falter not, and strong to do and dare,
Has found the magic charm sought for by alchemists of old,
For prayers of faith transform the dross of life to purest gold.
More wonderful in grand results than any fairy tale,
Reaching the goal of great success, where many thousands fail.

FARM MORTGAGES

A Safe Investment to Yield 6%

During our thirty-three years experience in handling farm mortgages there have been extreme fluctuations in general business conditions at different times, and general market securities have had their corresponding ups and downs.

Farming communities during that period have been hardly conscious of the vicissitudes of the business world, and farm mortgages have had a steady value.

We recommend carefully-made farm Mortgages as a means of safe investment to yield a reliable income.

FINANCIAL MISTAKES

THE men who have made great fortunes from manufacturing, trade, commerce, mines, inventions, and transportation are many, and year by year they are increasing in wealth and numbers; but all these are insignificant compared with those who have grown rich, or immensely wealthy, by the sudden or gradual increase of land values—what the late Henry George called "the unearned increment."

Some of the richest families in New York, and the same may be said of all our large cities, achieved their wealth, not through trade or other form of industry. Their shrewd ancestors bought land at a few dollars an acre—the taxes, for some unjustifiable reason, have always been low on "unimproved property"—and held it, or their heirs held it, until the demands of an increasing population compelled a division of the acres into lots—usually sixteen lots to the acre—and in time each of these lots became more valuable than the original farm from which it was carved.

We are not complaining about a procedure sanctioned by law and eminently respectable; for our purpose is simply to show how so many great fortunes have been made with little or no effort on the part of the possessors. Now, fortunately, all this wealth from increased land values has not gone into the coffers of those already wealthy, for tens of thousands of our deserving, hard-working countrymen have achieved a competency through their smaller land holdings, and some have become unexpectedly rich. But there has been a great difference in the way in which the large and the small realty owners have disposed of their earnings.

Jacob Weber's Luck

You will infer from this name that Jacob Weber, who is still living, is a German, but though his parents were sturdy Hanoverians, he was born in the vicinity of New York City, where, soon after his majority, he married an American wife, the daughter of a farmer for whom he worked as a gardener. Being industrious and thrifty, Jacob Weber began saving from the day he left school, so that by the time he was able to marry he had laid by enough money to buy five acres of ground from his father-in-law, and to build thereon a little cottage to which he took his young wife. On these five acres, on which he raised the best of vegetables and the most marketable of flowers, Jacob Weber not only supported his family of two girls and a boy, but he was able to pay off the mortgage and to give the children a better education than the father and mother had had. His ambition was to have his son a doctor, while one of the girls chose to be a teacher and the other a trained nurse.

The son was practising medicine, the daughters were working at their callings, and Jacob Weber was still cultivating vegetables and flowers, when his father-in-law died, and a survey for more streets was made through his garden.

By the will of her father, Mrs. Weber was able to add twenty acres more to the holdings. Jacob, who loved his garden, did not regard the advance of the conquering city with pleasure. He tolerated the trolley line that was built by his door, for it the better enabled the girls to reach their work in the city, but he was heart-broken when the surveyors came to lay out the streets, and he saw the vanishing of flower beds and vegetable rows.

The survey was hardly finished when Jacob Weber and his wife were called on by a real estate promoter who offered them a thousand dollars an acre for their holdings. They refused, and then he wanted to buy an option for twenty-five hundred dollars an acre, but this was also rejected. The following week, and after consulting with their children, they sold all the land to another party, who proposed to call the place "Rose Park," for eighty thousand dollars in cash, or two hundred dollars a lot. These same lots were selling for seven hundred dollars each before another year had passed.

"I am going to put every dollar paid for my land into a farm just a little further out," said Jacob Weber's brother-in-law, who had sold his twenty-five acres on the same conditions; "and, Jake," he added, "I'd advise you to do the same, for you won't be happy away from the garden."

Mrs. Weber's brother carried out his own plan, and is to-day worth about a quarter of a million, but Jacob Weber listened to his doctor son and to the girls, and was induced to go into the city. Ten thousand dollars he invested in a little frame house with two lots, on a poor street, this because he must have a patch of garden.

The Fruit of Inexperience

Like other good husbands and wives with families, Jacob and Mrs. Weber lived only for their children. Away from the little farm and amid the roar and bustle of the great city, they were as children themselves, without the power of adaptation and ready to be led. The son, who had recently married, being quite sure that if he had an automobile, instead of being "a walking doctor," and had a house in a good neighborhood, he could build up a practice in no time, was given the money with which to enlarge his opportunities.

The sisters at once felt that they had a right each to the same amount that had been given the brother, and they got it, for both had given up their work and married—married men who believed they were heiresses, and acted accordingly.

Jacob Weber's knowledge of finance was limited, and he was suspicious of outside advice. He had always kept his spare cash in a savings bank, and so he deposited his money up to the full amount these institutions would receive; the rest Mrs. Weber kept concealed in the mattress on which they lay.

The end of the story is in sight. The doctor's practice did not keep pace with his expenses. The husbands of the daughters did not feel that they must work, so long as their father-in-law had money. What could be expected? The money concealed in the mattress was expended. With growing rapidity, the savings bank accounts were exhausted. Then the little frame house with the two lots was sold. To-day Jacob Weber and his wife are on the brother-in-law's new farm caring for the garden.

"What Might Have Been"

Whittier writes:

Of all sad words of tongue or pen,
The saddest are these: "It might have been."

Jacob Weber was not a speculator, nor need he have been to have grown richer through the legitimate business opportunities springing up about him. But see what he might have done had he not used the family mattress as a bank and so drawn on his principal. Money was in great demand to build houses on the expensive lots, and he could have loaned all his money on good bonds and mortgages at six per cent., thus securing forty-eight hundred dollars a year income. He could have rented or bought a little place to carry on his gardening, and there would be enough left to help the doctor and girls in a reasonable way. Or, to avoid all trouble, Jacob Weber could have placed his money at five per cent., securing bonds as safe as those of the State in return, with one of the investment companies that were at

5 Beautiful Plants For a Favor

THE photograph below (half size) shows an exact reproduction of the collection of five plants that we have arranged to offer to Christian Herald readers in a way that will enable them to secure the flowers in return for a favor. The collection consists of an unusual assortment of Roses, Vines and Dahlias for both indoor and outdoor culture. There is a Dahlia; a Clematis Paniculata, which is a magnificent Hardy Climbing Vine; an Asparagus Spregeri; a Violet Plant, and one of the Charles Dingee Rose Bushes, which is a new rose and considered by many gardeners as the best, healthiest, and strongest-growing, freest-blooming, Hardy Rose Bush in the world. Each plant is carefully labeled, and complete instructions accompany each package. These plants have already reached the period in their lives when the fresh and young green leaves begin to appear, so that fine results are assured. They are now approximately 10 inches high.

Charles Dingee Rose

Clematis Paniculata The flowers are pure white and they are borne in great panicles or clusters of bloom, fairly covering the plants, so that it is a mass or sheet of fleecy white with an exquisite fragrance. It begins to bloom late in August and reaches a height of 15 to 20 feet. Hardy in all sections of the country. It is one of the most magnificent vines that can be planted. See the illustration for an idea of this plant.

Dahlia The Dahlia is a very beautiful plant for the yard. It makes tubers not unlike a sweet potato, but it is not hardy and blooms in late summer. The flowers are clear pink.

Violet This Violet is known as the "Lady Hume Campbell." It is the best double blue. Strong, healthy and hardy. It is a plant that has always been successful in various climates.

Asparagus Spregeri

This is a famous and attractive green vine, intended for house culture. It is for pots, vases, or hanging baskets. The long, slender branches droop most gracefully, clothed with feathery, emerald green fronds. It is a strong plant.

Charles Dingee Rose

The Great New Rose known as the "Charles Dingee Rose" is said to be one of the best and most beautiful introductions of the century. It is the result of cross-breeding between Humosa with grand, old hardy Pink variety, and White Maman Chochet, perhaps the greatest of all white garden roses, which insures its offspring every point of excellence. It has a hardy, vigorous constitution, and is said to grow to perfection in almost any soil or situation. This rose is said to have been growing and blooming in a temperature very little above freezing. It grows to a height of 2 to 3 feet and blooms continuously. It produces immense, grandly formed flowers on long stiff, erect stems. It is practically impossible to describe how beautiful these flowers are because of the delicate blending of colors; rose tints in the centre of the flowers gradually fade into pale blush and creamy white.

Clematis Paniculata

There are Five Plants in this Collection Twice the Size of This Illustration

You Will Be More Than Pleased With This New Assortment

This assortment of flowers is different from any we have ever used. It is not made up of slips, as these plants have commenced to sprout, and the petals will be found to be green and fresh, all ready for cultivation. They will reach you packed in soil best suited for their production, carefully wrapped in oil paper, and all shipped in a nice pasteboard box, which fully protects their natural and healthy condition.

We are prepared to give prompt service, and our readers, by taking advantage of this opportunity at once, can expect to have the roses in their possession within a short time after the order has been sent us.

This Plan Will Enable You to Secure Them Without Cost

We will give this collection of five plants to any Christian Herald reader who will send a new eight months' subscription to the Christian Herald for some person who is not now a reader, remitting at the same time $1.00 to pay for the new subscription.

Ask one of your friends to give you a trial subscription for the Christian Herald for eight months at $1.00. Send the name of the new subscriber to us together with one dollar, and we will mail postpaid to you, or to any address designated, these five plants, guaranteed to be just as represented.

Great Lives: Samuel*

OFTEN in the lives of great nations, when to the casual observer it would seem that demoralization and destruction were surely impending, a strong and righteous personality comes forward to restrain and save.

Thus was it with Israel in the stormy days of the Judges. The national spirit had almost melted away. Patriotism in consequence was weak and divided. Even the priests were held in small reverence, and Jehovah seemed to be nearly forgotten. Upon this degenerate people a great light dawned when Samuel was born—the child of prayer—passionately dedicated to the service of God, and single-eyed and single-hearted in his devotion to his people.

His power was early established. God spoke to him and through him, and the words of his prophecies were so uniformly fulfilled that soon he was surrounded by an army of believers and followers, who, through him, were reinstated in their ancient religion.

A Mussulman tradition relates that Samuel's birth was granted in answer to the prayers of the nation for "a still, strong man in a blatant land," after the overthrow of the sanctuary and the loss of the ark. This is untrue as an historical fact, but, says McClintock, "though false to the letter, it is true to the spirit of Samuel's life."

Gradually, as the youth grew to manhood, his power grew. "All the house of Israel were lamenting after the Lord," and their defeats and losses, as so often with individuals, drove them to their knees. Samuel seized the opportunity. His strong mind and loyal heart perceived that the mood of the nation was ripe for union and for a religious revival. He issued his great manifesto to them, condemning their idolatry, urging repentance and reform, and picturing the national rewards which a just God would surely bestow upon them if they were loyal. For the result of his appeal see I. Sam. 7: 4.

So Oliver Cromwell rose up to "confound the politics" of a corrupt generation. So John Wesley was given to England, when hollow formalism threatened with destruction its splendid church; and so Abraham Lincoln came to our nation to lead it out of bondage into freedom.

At Mizpeh, Samuel seems to have been granted almost kingly powers. Even the fame of Joshua, that great and noble judge, pales before that of the majestic Samuel. He was not a warrior like his wonderful predecessor, though he won one great battle; but God bestowed especial favor upon his generals in answer to his prayers and oblations. Thunder and lightning overwhelmed Israel's enemies, and through weapons not carnal came victory.

We cannot understand how it could happen that bad sons were given to this saintly man; but Abiah and Joel were evidently almost as wicked as Hophni and Phineas. Perhaps if they had been worthy to succeed him, Samuel would not have been petitioned to choose a king. He did not wish to accede to this request of the people; but in obedience to the divine voice, Saul was selected.

Then Samuel summed up his own life before his people—that righteous, consecrated life—ending with his constant injunction, "Only fear the Lord."

The later selection of David and the death of Samuel form dramatic climaxes which have often inspired our poets. The whole story of Samuel is thrilling, unusual, noble — a great prophet, leader, teacher and Judge. No wonder that his name has been given to many of our best and greatest. It is an honor to bear the name of such a hero.

True Wisdom*

IT IS a singular fact that perspective and proportion usually change in our sight from year to year. The things which seemed most important to you as a boy, often take a much lower place in your mind in manhood. The absorbing interests of last year may have become now matters of secondary value to you. The most consummate wisdom is required to look forward into the future, gauge the circumstances in which you are likely to be placed, and foresee your wants and opinions then.

Because of this strange ignorance, men study history and biography. They know that the experiences of men and nations in the past are probably repeated in all ages. The tales of Scripture are most valuable for this purpose. There is scarcely a record of the life of any ancient Hebrew worthy which is not replete with lessons for every one of us.

Some men seem to be gifted with a natural sense of values—a keen judgment of the expediency of this or that course; a wise foresight of future events and the proper methods of meeting them. It is a rare faculty, and yet it is known as "common" sense. When this is coupled with a sincere desire to serve God, and a confidence in prayer, it is sometimes called "sanctified common sense." Perhaps the late D. L. Moody was as good an exemplar of this wonderful endowment as was ever known. Let us all pray that we may have it.

The best of intentions count for little unless wisdom accompanies them. Bishop McVicker illustrates this fact by a grotesque story of a dear old motherly elephant, whose heart was overflowing with tender compassion for all things weak and helpless. In an unlucky moment she found a brood of partridges whose mother had gone in search of food.

"You poor, deserted, motherless creatures!" she cried, "I will care for you. I will brood over you," and she proceeded to sit down upon them as tenderly as she knew how.

"The world," remarks Bishop Charles D. Williams, commenting upon this parable, "is full of such blundering beneficence. I sometimes think that it has suffered more from foolish saints than from intentional knaves. Zeal without knowledge, good intentions without wisdom have worked as much havoc as has malevolence."

Wisdom does not often come at once to a man. Even though he be born with more than the usual endowment of common sense and of intellect, yet still he will blunder and fall from time to time. "It is human to err," said the old Latin sage.

Thus it is with most of us—we attain unto the highest wisdom only through darkness and anguish, through striving and warfare. God gives us what is best for the soul.

Financial Mistakes

that time advancing money to the people hurriedly building on the old farm.

Had the latter course been adopted, and the bonds kept in his own, or in his wife's name, Jacob Weber would have been in receipt of four thousand dollars a year, which, if he chose, he could have divided into four equal parts, the children getting three-fourths. Then adventurers would not have sought out the daughters, and the doctor's industry and ability might have won without the aid of a fine house and an automobile. There are many honest acts so foolish as to seem almost criminal.

This Water-Sealed, Heat-Tight Top Makes Fireless Cooking Perfect!

YOU have only one question to consider in choosing a Fireless Cooker: Which one best retains the heat?

Until we invented the Water Sealed Top of the IDEAL the perfect Fireless Cooker did not exist. Right out of the top—the hottest part—the heat streams away from the ordinary fireless cookers that precious heat which is the one thing needful. When you examine your IDEAL Fireless Cooker you will see that loss of heat simply cannot take place through its water seal.

Even without its Water - Sealed Top, the IDEAL would be superior to all other Fireless Cookers, because of its solid aluminum construction and its exclusive features. With that Top, there is no comparison between its efficiency and that of ordinary Fireless Cookers.

Because of its perfect heat retention the IDEAL will save 75 to 80 per cent. of your fuel bill, and more than half the time you now spend in the kitchen.

You'll be delighted with the way the IDEAL bakes and roasts, boils, stews, steams and fries, giving you food that is better cooked, more nutritious, finer flavored than can be had in any other way.

Each compartment of the IDEAL has a separate lid, with patent lever locks and "stop" hinges. To gain access to one compartment you do not disturb the whole cooker.

The solid aluminum lining is not weakened by nail holes or soldered joints.

Your cooking utensils will be the finest aluminum made—the "Wear Ever" brand.

You'll quickly prove that our handsome hardwood case, with vitrolized panels, retains heat more perfectly than a metal case can. Stoves are made of metal so that they shall give off heat. The fireless cooking principle is the exact opposite.

TRY THE IDEAL AT OUR RISK. Test the truth of every claim we make—cook your meals in it for 30 days. If at the end of that time you are willing to give it up send it back at our expense. Every cent you have paid will be refunded—you must like it or we don't want you to keep it.

ORDER AN IDEAL AT ONCE—LET IT PAY FOR ITSELF. You can pay for an IDEAL Fireless Cook Stove a little each month, if you desire. It will save enough in fuel alone to pay for itself before your payments are all made. Write today for the Ideal Fireless Cook Book and details of our Easy Payment plan. We want you to have these at once.

TRAINING GIRLS TO FARM LIFE

Mrs. Belmont's New Farm School and the Wonderful Work Going on There

"ALL of my life," says Mrs. O. H. P. Belmont, "I have been looking forward to the establishment of a farm-school for women, to include also landscape gardening. At last I have accomplished my long desire."

Two hundred acres of Mrs. Belmont's fine Brookholt estate at Hempstead, L. I., have been given up to the uses of such a school, and nine embryo girl-farmers are studying and working there.

In charge of them and directing their labors is Mrs. Laura D. Williams, an efficient Quaker "farmer-lady" from Philadelphia. She was brought up on a farm and has been in the work all her life. The girls are housed in a pleasant and picturesque farmhouse, under the care of Mrs. Jacobina Levy, formerly connected with the Sheltering and Guardian Society of New York City.

"There is no reason why women should not make successful farmers," says Mrs. Belmont. "All that they need is proper training. Farming is a beautiful work, and when have women failed to be interested in beautiful work? In England, women at the head of great estates often undertake the management of them. They take far more interest in their grounds and houses than our women do. Here we leave the work to outsiders and say, 'Don't bother me until it is done.' There they are keenly observant of every step and direct it all."

The girls work ten hours a day, but insist cheerfully that the hours are not too long. They wear straw, poked farmer's hats, blue jumpers, and overalls, and, tied around their necks, carelessly knotted bandanas. Mrs. Williams wears a blue print blouse and bloomers, which are so full that they give the effect of a short skirt, while affording the utmost freedom of movement.

Every night each girl makes a report of the day's work in a diary. These records tell what has been done during the day, the methods used, the kind of soil found, and every detail of the plowing, planting and reaping. They will be invaluable to the owners in after years.

"How did you happen to come here?" a visitor asked one of the bright, energetic, intelligent girl workers.

"I read about it in the papers. I have always wanted to be a landscape gardener, and I thought this would be a good way to begin."

"What were the qualifications demanded of you?"

"First, you must be physically fit, of course. Then you have to answer many questions, and if you can persuade the managers that you are a likely candidate, you are accepted."

Every visitor is impressed with the superior intelligence and refinement of the nine girls. Combined with these traits, they show also a certain alertness and surety of purpose which, as one observer remarked, "does not belong to the girl who has picked up a new project simply for a lark."

One of the brightest of the girls is deaf and dumb, though she holds a college diploma. Every girl is kept on probation for a period of two months. If by that time she proves to be able, strong and zealous, she proceeds and is paid $16 per month.

The rising gong sounds at 6 A.M.; breakfast is at 6.30 and at 7 work begins. At 12 comes dinner. At one, the girls start out again, returning for supper at 6, and the evening is spent in talking over the day's work and the writing of the diaries. The final ceremony of the day's actual work is the milking of the cows. Covered from head to foot with white gowns, the girls take turns at playing milkmaid each night.

Comfort and Cheer at the End of the Day

On the morning when the corn was to be planted, one girl harnessed the slow and steady farm-horse, known as "Philadelphia," and the rest "piled into" the farm cart and drove down the road to the fields. Ahead of them was Mrs. Williams, driving the horse known as "Thousand Dollars." She was guiding a harrow.

Once in the field where the planting was to be done, the girls jumped out and gathered around a pile of phosphate bags. These were soon opened and the girls went rapidly over the field, whitening the brown, up-turned earth as they ran. The wet corn was then made ready in pails, a pail was slung over the shoulder of each girl, and they started down the rows.

"We expect to have this year," said Mrs. Williams, "sixteen acres of field corn, four acres of sweet corn, nine of potatoes, and plots for spinach, beets, carrots, radishes, cabbages, tomatoes and other vegetables. Large rhubarb and asparagus beds are already started. In time we shall run a motor-truck to the New York markets. There will be a uniform for the chauffeur, which will fit the first girl that learns to run the automobile. But thee may be sure," laughed the good lady, "that we shall arrange it so that there will not be one of us whom the suit will not fit!"

Mrs. Williams thinks that the course of training can hardly be finished in less than a year. The girls must learn not only to put in the crops and to gather them, but care for and dispose of them.

There are numerous agricultural schools throughout the country, but they are connected mainly with colleges and other institutions, and they are not exclusively for women. Mrs. Belmont's school is probably the only one of its kind in the United States.

It is her intention to give the girls who show aptitude and interest every opportunity, with the hope that, on leaving, they will be able to take positions as superintendents, or go still farther into the field of landscape gardening. And it is this brand of ambition and enthusiasm which makes the girls at Brookholt oblivious to aching muscles and clay-coated shoes, and brings a smile to their faces when you speak about the ten-hour day with an interrogation point in your eyes.

The farmhouse is planned both for comfort and beauty. Gabled windows peer out from under a sloping roof, to the very shingles of which vines have clambered along the corners of the house. The house itself, with veranda running its entire length, faces a big graveled courtyard, across the way from which is a long line of neatly kept stables. On the south end a road leads out to the fields and pastures.

In an interesting article about this new departure in the education of girls, the New York Times remarks that it is probably the pioneer of many similar institutions to follow.

THE BONDAGE OF FEAR

TEXT: Ps. 56:3—"What time I am afraid, I will trust in thee."

THE keynote of this song, at once so plaintive and so confident, is trust in God. The writer states a hard case, with dangers without and fears within; but the ultimate issue is the triumph of faith. He is hard bestead, worn out, beaten and broken, hemmed in by enemies as in a circle of steel, till his heart almost fails and his courage droops. The Psalm begins with a cry for pity: "Be merciful unto me, O God; for man crusheth me; all day fighting, he oppresseth me." The crushing suggests some cruel, heartless treatment. "All day mine enemies crush me; yea, many are they that haughtily fight against me." But the Psalmist recollects himself, or rather he recollects God; and in the recollection he strikes a note that drowns the low, plaintive melody of the first verses. "In the day when I am afraid, I will trust in Thee." In one moment he lays hold of something of the undaunted courage of faith.

Faith and Fear

Faith is often spoken of as if it were a weak thing, of a puling, whining nature; as if it were a kind of cowardice that runs to cover as an escape. That is a misrepresentation. From one aspect faith is simply courage; moral courage, that will not give in, that refuses to be beaten, that will not doubt the love of God though everything seems against believing. In the day when I am afraid, when I have most cause to be afraid, I will trust in Thee. When clouds are heaviest and despair is on the heart, faith clings tenaciously to God. The Psalmist will not be overmastered by his fears and coerced by his dangers; for instinctively such a courageous soul feels that "sudden the worst turns the best to the brave." "In God have I put my trust; I will not be afraid; what can flesh do unto me?" The fear comes back and floods his life again; for the trouble is still there. But he never is quite engulfed, and there breaks out the same refrain of trust in God: "I will not be afraid."

Life still knows the menace of fear, though the forms of it may have changed. Every life has its troubles without and fears within, its dark moments, its difficult passes, its dangers and distresses. Men live in the shadow, oppressed with care and anxiety, burdened with loads too heavy, harassed with fears and doubts. The bondage of fear has been the weariest slavery of the race. It has its roots no doubt in sin, though we cannot trace definite connections in particular cases. Fear entered Eden when sin entered. "They heard the voice of the Lord God, and Adam and his wife hid themselves. And the Lord God called unto Adam and said, Where art thou? And he said, I heard thy voice in the garden, and I was afraid." Fear has gripped man and held him in spiritual tyranny. Men have been afraid of life and of death, afraid of to-day and of to-morrow, afraid of the living and of the dead, afraid of man and of God, afraid of everything and of nothing. The primitive instinct of dread so forcibly described by Kipling has its abode still in life; in different forms, but none the less real.

> Through the Jungle very softly flits a shadow and a sigh—
> He is Fear, O little Hunter; he is Fear!
> Very softly down the glade runs a waiting, watching shade,
> And the whisper spreads and widens far and near:
> And the sweat is on thy brow, for he passes even now—
> He is Fear, O little Hunter; he is Fear!

We say gaily that knowledge and the spread of education have killed fear. We point to superstitions, the dread of unknown powers, the terror of the unseen, which have been mitigated if not destroyed by knowledge. This is indeed so; and true knowledge is of God, for God is light, and in him is no darkness at all. But it is not true that fear is dead, or that mere knowledge ever can give it its quietus. Knowledge can only glean in the fields after the reapers. The mind of man can only set in terms of reason what the soul of man has discovered. Superstition is killed by faith. A false religion is displaced in the world not by criticism but by a true religion. And it is not the case as a matter of fact that fear has ceased to be a bondage to men. To think so you must be ignorant of life; must have had your eyes shut to the hunted look on human faces; must never even have faced the spectres of your own mind. There is ever a death's head at the world's feasts; and black Care still rides behind many a horseman. It may be that we no longer tremble at mystery and bow down before the idols which represent the forces of nature; but have we solved the mystery? Has knowledge robbed life and destiny of their unknown elements? Philosophy can sometimes conquer the fear of life. A spurious peace can be got from forgetfulness of the problems of life; by shutting the eyes, or by hopeless acquiescence in the sordidness of existence. That sort of peace could always be got in that way.

With all our knowledge of natural forces and our command of material resources, life has still its appalling changes, its uncertainties. Men can still be mastered by an unspoken dread, a nameless terror. Are there no misgivings in men's minds, no heart-sinkings about the future, no distrust of self even, never an apprehension of evil, never a shiver at the possible? I speak not of the fear of death, though that must always be our portion; for the love of life is natural and therefore the fear of death is natural. It is only when the spirit is broken, when nerve is lost, when body or mind or heart is diseased, that death can ever seem a gain. And if in our modern world-weariness there is a school with their morbid high-priests of literature and art who worship at the shrine of death and speak of it affectedly as our gentle mother, even that is but another proof of heart-sickness and the fear of life. Doubt is the disease of thought; and is twin-sister of fear. We may lay all the ghosts we can, go whistling to keep our courage up, to prove that there is nothing but shadows to frighten us. But the ghosts will not be laid. Fear clings to life, elusive as the mist on the mountains.

The Darkness of Fear

Even when fear for self is beaten back from the gates, there remains for every true man fear of self. When we stop to think and look back on the past, we can be afraid of our own base impulses and cravings. We may well be afraid of our own weakness. It may be a wholesome fear, and be to us the mother of safety, as Burke called it. It may be one of the hounds of heaven to drive us from the wilderness into the fold.

Further, if self can be forgotten, as perhaps it can be, is there no fear for others in our hearts? Some of you have whispered with trembling lip in the sanctuary your fears for those you love. Perfect love casts out fear; and even our imperfect human love casts out fear of the loved, but not always fear for him. You would shield your loved ones and put protecting arms around them. Paul confesses the fear he had for some of his beloved converts lest they should be drawn away; and is not ashamed even to confess the fear which sometimes chilled his heart lest he himself might be a castaway. There are noble forms of fear, born of love itself. Job is depicted in all his happiness and prosperity rising up early in the morning to pray and make offerings for his sons and daughters; for Job said, "It may be that my sons have sinned and cursed God in their hearts." When the blow fell, he knew that he had been dreading something like this all his life. "The thing which I greatly feared is come upon me; and that which I was afraid of is come unto me."

Life is open to fear in other directions. Somewhere or other it can grip you by the throat; if not at this turn of the road, at the next possibly; if not in any of the places I have mentioned, yet at some spot, your heart knows where. There is fear we must all have known—if not, then be afraid of your own want of fear—the fear which sin always brings; to one, as with Macbeth, "the perilous stuff which weighs upon the heart" with its remorse and pain; to another, as with Gloster in King Henry VI., the "suspicion which always haunts the guilty mind."

Need I heap up more evidence? Need I speak of fears of the future, of the fears which find voice in our books about the forces at work in society with their possible social changes, of the natural timidity which looks with shrinking on new and untried paths? We speak glibly of this as a transition period. We perhaps believe that conditions more true and just may emerge; but everywhere you find men dreading the plunge, the passage through the cloud.

Fear is the sign of evil in the world; the symbol of the mystery of iniquity. We have all to meet it sooner or later in some form or other. It is the great bondage of the race. See it in the tired and startled eyes of men and women with care and anxiety marked on their brow. Life is often lived under a gray sky and on a sodden earth. The weight of to-morrow burdens to-day. The troubles of the future kill the joy of the present. It is no unique experience for a man to say, "What time I am afraid."

The Light of Faith

We have seen that some of the causes of fear are the same as in the Psalmist's day. We look to see if the cure of fear is the same with us as with him. If we can say that the cause of our sickness of heart is doubt, doubt of self, of life, of God, the cure for it is faith. The owls and bats and dark night-birds that hoot in our ears are driven from us by one stroke of the flashing sword of the rising sun. As in all the great controversies in religion and life, the battle is to be fought out in the region of presuppositions. That is why every controversy resolves itself into some ultimate and simple philosophy of life. So here, if we realize that God's love is the heart of the universe and the centre of life, fear of all kinds must depart. In proportion as that creed is a living faith with us are all fears maimed or dispelled. If we accept that love, if we apply it to our every need, if we breathe in it, live in it, where is there room for fear? Want of faith in God means want of faith in human destiny, and the world becomes a riddle and life a terror. But faith in God, faith in the moral order of the universe and in the protecting love of the Father, saves from despair. In God there is no room for fear. "What time I am afraid, I will trust in Thee."

This is not something to be argued about, but simply to be stated as experience, and to be tested experimentally. Living in the filial relationship with God in which Christ lived, we are emancipated. Christ's Gospel is the gospel of the grace of God, good news of great joy to the sorrowful, glad tidings to the sinful and fearful. "Fear not" was a word often on his lips. He comes to-day to bring men to God, bringing God with him: he comes over life's broken waters, making a great calm: "It is I, be not afraid." A touch of his hand quiets the fevered pulse: a look of his eye brings peace: a smile of his lips illumines the world. Christ's very presence in the world is a message of courage. Why are ye fearful, O ye of little faith? Look up to the bright light in the clouds. Ye are not unregarded. Life has a meaning. God has a purpose with you in your struggle and patience and loving service. Be of good cheer.

What is your fear? Of man? Put yourself on to the side of God; and then say, "The Lord is on my side: I will not fear: what can man do unto me?"

Do you fear sin and its power? Love's redemption will snatch you from the jaws of the dragon. Courage! Take heart of grace. "Sin shall not have dominion over you. Faith grips the quiver of trembling flesh with a strong hand. Christ transmutes fear into faith. The true fear of God kills all other fear, even the fear of self.

In the Shadow of the Almighty

Are you afflicted with love's fear, for some you think of and pray for? Love more: love higher. There is no fear in love. The cloud of it passes away in the flood of sunshine from God's perfect love.

Do you fear for the world? It is God's world, and is the scene of his redemptive work.

Do you fear for the Church, for the cause of truth and righteousness and peace? It is not for you to tremble for the Ark of God. Truth is inviolable: love is invincible. God's will shall be done on earth, and his kingdom come—oppose it who dare. Fear not, O little flock; it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom. Lift up your face with the stain of tears and believe. Faith shall live; fear and all the dragon brood shall die. Be of good cheer; be not afraid. Take up the burden of your life again with comfort in your heart, and let Christ's peace rule within. "He that dwelleth in the secret place of the Most High shall abide under the shadow of the Almighty." "In the depths where no God is and no heart to love him, all sorrow lasteth long; on the heights of devotion we still have sorrows, only they are short. Just as the nights are longer in the valleys; but in the mountains they last not long, and a gleam of red showeth always where day has been, or is to be."

"What time I am afraid, I will trust in Thee."

French Statesman Killed

HE French Minister of War, Mons. Henri Maurice Berteaux, was instantly killed, and Mons. Monis, the Premier of France, was very seriously injured when an aeroplane dashed into the Premier's party at Issy-les-Moulineaux on May 21. The party had gone at an early hour in the morning to see the start of the Paris to Madrid race and was permitted to pass through the great crowd to a point of vantage within the aerodrome, where the start could be seen to best advantage. Three aviators had already succeeded in getting away, and a fourth had started only to fall and wreck his machine after going but a short distance, when Emile Train essayed to start, carrying a passenger in a monoplane of his own construction.

As Mons. Train rose from the ground the commandant of the troops keeping order on the ground sent a squadron of cuirassiers to keep back a crowd that was attempting to cross the field. The monoplane came toward the cavalry at a speed of about forty miles an hour, and for a moment it seemed that it would dash among the soldiers. Then it suddenly swooped toward the earth under the impulse of an air flurry. The pilot's attention seemed momentarily to have been diverted from his course and he made a quick turn to the left toward the point where the party of officials was standing. Then he lost control of the craft altogether and it dashed violently into the group.

The impact knocked Mons. Berteaux ten feet away, where he lay badly mangled, while under the wreckage lay Mons. Monis, his son and Mons. Henri Deutsch de la Meurthe, a patron of motoring and flying.

A scene of frightful confusion followed the fall of the monoplane. From all parts of the aviation field arose cries of alarm and dismay and tens of thousands of persons broke through the lines and moved toward the scene of the accident. When the troops had been given back the throng by charging it repeatedly the surgeons in attendance examined the men lying on the ground. Mons. Berteaux was dead. Mons. Monis was apparently severely injured, but conscious. The Premier showed remarkable fortitude. Though terribly injured about the head and through his leg was fractured in three places he never for one moment lost consciousness. His words as he was picked up were "It is nothing."

Mons. Train was heartbroken. He said that the tragedy was due to his efforts to avoid injury to the troops. Mons. Berteaux was a man of national prominence in France. He was born in 1852 and has for many years been active in the world of finance. He was said to have been a candidate for the presidency of France in 1913.

Organizing for Peace

By EUGENE THWING

STATESMEN and Peace Societies throughout the world are leading the nations toward arbitration. Almost every day sees some progress. A treaty is now believed possible between the United States and Japan, like that proposed between this country and Great Britain, which will provide for the arbitration of all matters, including questions of national honor. The mere fact that there is serious discussion of such a treaty affecting these three great naval powers shows what remarkable progress has been made during the past year.

International arbitration, however, is only one feature of the advancing movement for world-wide peace. The spirit of peace must fill the hearts of men before militarism ceases to intrude itself in the life of nations. The question is coming home more and more to the individual. Thousands of men and women are considering how they, personally, can help on this great work for Christianity and humanity.

THE most definite and practical plan for focusing this interest, in order that tangible results may be achieved, is announced by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in its call for the formation of Peace Circles by its readers throughout the country. If every subscriber should respond to this call and gather ten members into a local Peace Circle, at once three and a half millions of persons would begin working for world peace. This would be direct obedience to the exhortation of Paul, who said, "Let us consider one another to provoke one another unto love and to good works; not forsaking the assembling of ourselves together, as the manner of some is; but exhorting one another; and so much more, as ye see the day approaching."

The manner of assembling together the Peace Circles, and the plans by which the members may "provoke one another" to work which will really count in advancing the cause may be learned by correspondence with the Peace Circle Department of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York City. I shall be surprised if thousands of inquiries do not reach that department very soon.

WHAT, after all, is peace, in reality? Perhaps the coming of that world peace, of which the angels sang on the first Christmas morning, may be hastened if we clearly understand that peace is not merely the cessation of war between nations—the disuse of navies and armies. Such a condition may be only the absence of outward hostilities. Real peace is not an external but an internal condition.

You have seen two boys fighting on the street, when suddenly a policeman comes in sight. At once all is serene, and the boys appear very innocently occupied in something else. Is there peace between them? Look at the flashing eyes and the threatening fists when the policeman's back is turned. War is heaving and sputtering out of sight. Compulsory arbitration is something like that. It is merely war under constraint. Certainly, it is better than fighting and killing, but it is not what the angels sang of. The Prince of Peace will not acknowledge it. Acting under international treaties, the stronger powers may force unwilling nations to put on sheep's clothing for a while, but if inwardly they are ravening wolves the era of "peace on earth, good will toward men" has not arrived. Treaties have been made and broken at convenience heretofore. Strong nations can agree, in theory, when self-interest seems to point the way, that war shall be no more. But let sudden stress come upon them; let suspicion of one another's good faith and purposes arise—as, for example, if a powerful hostile battleship fleet should appear unexpectedly off our coasts—then, unless there were a deeper basis of peace than mere treaties, the war spirit would flame from one end of the nation to the other, and it could not be controlled.

GENUINE peace can come only from love in the heart. Submission to the rule of the Prince of Peace will be far more effective than international arbitration. The 9th, 10th, 14th and 18th to 21st verses of the 12th chapter of Romans should form the articles of a universal treaty of brotherhood between man and man. Here is great work for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Peace Circles. It may not be sensational; it may not be reported with big headlines in the newspapers; but it will count.

Draw up your Peace Treaty. Let it be thoroughly understood and signed as a solemn covenant by your members. Shut your doors for a while and pray earnestly for help and blessing that your lives may be fountains of gentleness; that you may avoid all occasions of strife in home, in business, in church, and social intercourse, that you may be, as individual members of a great crusade, truly makers of peace. Turn away not only the battle, but the desire for battle, from the gates. So shall the members of your Peace Circles be heralds of the coming age when world peace shall reign on the earth.

By the Sea of Galilee

See picture on cover of this issue.

FROM this modern picture of an incident in the daily life beside sacred and historic Galilee, we may readily reconstruct in imagination some of the scenes in the life of our Saviour. In Palestine progress is practically unknown. It is true that railroads have been built there, but the costumes worn and the customs and occupations of the people are largely the same as prevailed in the early years of our era. Still the fisherman brings to shore the food which he gleans from the waters of the beautiful lake; still the young housewives purchase and prepare it as in Bible times; and still the children play on the shores and gather in eager groups to see the boats come in. When THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Pilgrims reach the Holy Land next October, sights like this will often meet the eyes of the travelers, and they can re-live in fancy the thrilling days when Christ preached beside these very waters to similar groups, and the boats of the fishermen were brought to land bearing the food which still forms the chief animal subsistence of these simple folk. The picture on the cover of this issue is from a photograph copyrighted by Underwood & Underwood, New York.

Mexican Peace Treaty Signed

AT TEN o'clock P.M. on May 21, on the steps of the custom house in Juarez, a treaty or agreement of peace was signed between representatives of the Mexican Government and the revolutionists, designed to put an end to the war which has been going on there for six months past. Four automobiles brought the peace commissioners to the meeting-place, and their searchlights illuminated the pages of the peace agreement. The commissioners sat on the stone porch (the door being locked) and talked over the agreement with a group of friends, while a small crowd outside shouted "Viva la paz!"

Judge Carbajal represented the federal government and the revolutionary forces were represented by Dr. Francisco Vasquez Gomez, Francisco I. Madero, Sr. (father of General Madero), and Sr. Don. José Maria Pino Suarez. The agreement sets forth:

First—That Senor General Porfirio Diaz has manifested his resolution of resigning the Presidency of the republic before the end of the present month; and,

Second—That bona fide news is at hand that Ramon Corral will resign the Vice-Presidency of the republic within the same period; and,

Third—That by the administration of law, Senor Francisco Leon de la Barra, at present Minister of Foreign Relations of the government of Senor General Diaz, will assume for the interim the power of the executive of the nation, and will call the general elections according to the terms of the constitution; and,

Fourth—That the national government will study the conditions of public opinion to satisfy these conditions with the provisions of the constitution and will come to an agreement conducive to indemnifying the losses directly caused by the revolution. Therefore, the two parties represented in this conference, in view of the previous considerations, have agreed to formulate the following agreement:

From to-day on hostilities which have existed in the entire national territory of the republic shall cease between the forces of the government and those of the revolution, these forces to be dismissed in proportion as in each State the necessary steps are taken to re-establish and guarantee tranquillity and public order.

Transitory provision:

As soon as possible the reconstruction or repair of telegraph and railway lines hitherto interrupted shall be begun.

This agreement is signed in duplicate by three of the commissioners named, Judge Carbajal signing first, then the elder Madero, and Dr. Gomez. Sr. Suarez was to sign the next day, but his signature was not necessary. After signing, the federal envoy and Dr. Gomez embraced each other. Then Dr. Gomez and the elder Madero fell into each other's arms, overjoyed that the great act had been accomplished.

It is understood that the troops will be gradually disbanded as tranquillity is restored. General Madero has ordered all fighting stopped throughout the republic. He himself forced the situation by sending for Judge Carbajal and announcing that unless the peace terms were agreed to, including the resignation of Diaz and Corral, the armistice would end at once.

After the resignation of Diaz and his Cabinet there will be a new election, a reorganized federal administration and the removal of governors in those States where tyrannous and corrupt federal influences have dominated to the injury of the Mexican people.

Across the Andes on Muleback

A Wayside Cross in the Andes

Ferrying Luggage by Wire

Fording a Shallow and Treacherous Torrent

MY PLANS for a trip into the interior of Venezuela finally took form in the journey which started in January and from which I have just returned. Though three different States of the Republic of Venezuela were passed through and I even crossed the border into Colombia, the entire journey was in that territory across which stretch the northern ranges of the Andes. The start was made from Maracaibo, where we have our mission station. Boarding the little steamer, which plies on Lake Maracaibo and some of its tributary streams, I crossed the lake and went eighty miles up one of the tributaries into the heart of the jungle and the forest.

As the trip was made distinctly as a mission journey and for the purpose of spreading the Gospel, no opportunity was to be lost. I started with tracts to distribute, Bibles and religious books to sell, and copies of our paper to use in seeking new subscriptions. This paper, La Estrella de la Mañana (The Morning Star) is the first and only evangelical paper in Venezuela and Colombia. On the boat I met three of our subscribers, and during the voyage secured some new ones. I also used the opportunity to distribute tracts. When the steamer entered the river up which it was to make its way, we were in the midst of all that tropical wonderland of which so much has been told. Gorgeous foliage and the brilliant colors of the tropic fauna were all around us. On the river's banks lay great crocodiles, many of which would measure twenty feet in length, taking their sun-baths and awaiting any unwary living thing that might come to drink. Some of the passengers on the steamer treated them to surprises in the shape of bullets from a rifle or revolver.

When we arrived at a small city near the foot of the Andes, and I had arranged my business, I mounted a mule and started the long climb into the mountains. Here the greatest opportunities of the trip, as well as the greatest dangers, were found. I always carried with me a few copies of the books and papers; and along the road I scattered this precious seed. The stock of books which I had brought with me I sent ahead as freight. When I came to a city or town, I started out with my satchel full of Bibles and papers and went from home to home and from store to store. It generally took me from one to three days to do my work in each place. I would then set out for the next city. This programme of broadcast sowing of tracts and Bibles and religious literature was continued for seven weeks. During that time many chances came to tell the story of salvation as well as to leave behind a Bible or some religious book, and a subscriber to whom our paper will go twice each month.

Long journeys alone through this rugged country are far from pleasant or free from danger. Starts before dawn and last stops after nightfall become the order of the day. It is not at all unusual to start at two or three o'clock in the morning so that one may reach the next stopping-place before night. The roads wind up and down through the mountains, they cross and recross the shallow yet treacherous torrents. Often they degenerate to mere trails through the wild and dense forests, or across the face of some precipitous rock they wind as narrow paths which barely afford room for the feet of the mule, and on which a single misstep means death. Here, as in many other parts of Spanish America, the people erect a simple wooden cross where a death has taken place by the wayside.

SECOND METHODIST CHURCH IN RUSSIA

TWO years ago, Bishop William Burt, LL.D., of the Methodist Church, dedicated the first Methodist chapel on Russian soil at Wirballen on the German border.

On last Russian New Year's Day (January 14, new style), it was our pleasure to celebrate a second dedicatory service; this time at Kowno-Schanze, about two hours' ride by railroad from Wirballen. The first service held in the new edifice was the Quarterly Conference, conducted by the writer. This was followed by a genuine Methodist watch-night service which was concluded with the sacrament of the Lord's Supper.

Favored with ideal winter weather, of the real Russian sort, we had an attendance of 528 persons the next forenoon, when the Bishop preached a dedication sermon on "Christ, the Only Foundation," and the new house of prayer was impressively dedicated. At the song-service in the afternoon there were over 700 people present, more than 200 of this number standing patiently over three hours! A happy and grateful spirit manifested itself in all the addresses and songs. Among the guests none were more attentive than their Excellencies Governor Werewkin and wife of the province of Kowno. The governor made a speech in Russian, adding a few congratulatory words in German. In private conversation, the governor's wife told the Bishop she was happy to hear an English sermon, her grandfather having been an Englishman. In the higher circles the Russians speak English, French and German fluently.

The next day was observed as a "Second New Year's Day," as it is termed here. It was a Sunday. Our Bishop preached from the text: "As for Mephibosheth, he shall eat at my table, as one of the king's sons" (II. Sam. 9: 11). Nicely printed programmes added not a little to the festivity of the occasion, eight hundred copies of which were taken home by members and friends as souvenirs.

The plain, red-brick edifice now stands as a tangible demonstration that God still answers prayer! The entire property has a valuation of about $7,000, but there are still several thousand dollars of debt to be met. The main hall of the church has a seating capacity of 350, while the adjoining Sunday School room, opening into the auditorium, accommodates 100. The story of the beginning and development of the Methodist work at Kowno is a striking illustration of the parable of the mustard-seed. Many years ago, when large numbers of Germans emigrated to Russia to seek employment in the large factories in certain Russian centres, a colony settled down at Kowno. Among the latter there was a young man who later went to America, where he was converted in a Methodist church, and some time after he returned to Kowno on a visit. His heart was so full of joy that he told his relatives and friends what he had experienced in America. As a result of his simple earnest testimony a revival broke out. Because of business affairs the young man had to return to the United States, but the seed he had sown did not remain without fruit. The first thought of the young Kowno converts was the plan to organize a Sunday School for the study of the Bible. So they wrote to the Methodist Book Concern (Traktathaus) at Bremen, Germany, asking for Sunday School literature, and that a Methodist preacher be sent to them. At that time Rev. J. Staiger was manager of the Bremen Book Concern. He sent the Kowno letter to the district superintendent, Rev. Carl Schell, who forwarded it to Rev. Heinrich Ramke, then stationed at the large Methodist church in Koenigsberg, he being the nearest Methodist neighbor to Russia. From time to time Brother Ramke visited the friends at Kowno, and finally organized a Methodist society there. During the past five and a half years, Rev. George R. Durdis has been in charge of the work. His faithful wife, who was formerly an evangelist, and Local Preacher K. Piper, are helping him in his arduous labors at Kowno and Wirballen. From this circuit there have already come two promising candidates for the Russian mission, whom we sent to the Methodist Theological Institute at Frankfurt-am-Main, Germany, three years ago, but who are now obliged to serve in the Russian army.

Methodism has a great future in Russia, and is already preaching the Gospel in six different languages in this vast, cosmopolitan empire.

HOME LIFE IN ESKIMO LAND

A Family Living in an Earth Hut

A Little Eskimo Maid

Eskimos at Meal Time

By CHRISTIAN SCHMITT,
NAIN, LABRADOR

HAVE you any very definite idea of the living conditions or customs of the Eskimos, who are, after all, not such distant neighbors? In heir lives everything dates from the coming of pring. This is the beginning of the greatest activ-y for this odd race. Soon after Easter they pre-are for what they call the "Ice Hunt." Dogs are arnessed and sledges packed, and with his limited elongings, his wife and children, the Eskimo jour-eys to the immediate vicinity of the edge of the ice. 'his edge, or siña, as it is called by the Eskimos, lies utside the range of islands along the edges of the pen sea. It is the junction of the stationary ice, hich has formed during the winter, and the ice hich is continually drifted hither and thither by ides and winds.

The siña is the Eskimo's favorite hunting-ground. Here great gaps of open water frequently form, and hrough them the seals and walrus come to the sur-ace to breathe. This gives the Eskimo opportunity o put in operation his primitive hunting methods, f waylaying and killing these animals. Hunting n this manner on the edge of the ice is accompanied vith many dangers; the hunters, while venturing on he limited expanse of water in their frail kayaks, re often attacked by walrus, which sometimes suc-eed in upsetting the unstable little craft and drag-ing its occupant into the water. The walrus is specially vicious and dangerous when closely pur-ued or wounded. It is not uncommon, as the spring dvances, for the ice to be broken by the motion of he water, and those who have taken up their abode pon it are in constant danger of being drifted out nto the open ocean.

While the Eskimo lives on the ice or the outlying slands, he occupies either a snow house or a tent, ccording as the season is winter or summer. Some-imes small huts are built of rough stones for occu-ancy during the fall season. These igloos, as they re called, are very tiny; a man of ordinary height an seldom stand upright in them.

One-half of the floor of the hut is somewhat ele-ated, and when covered with furs serves as a couch or the night, where all the members of the house-old sleep side by side.

Fuel is extremely scarce among these people and hey seemingly have accustomed themselves to do without it. Their food, which consists chiefly of fish, seal and walrus meat, is frequently consumed in its raw state. Inside the igloo a seal-oil lamp is kept burning, and a small tin can filled with water, which is hung above it, supplies hot or boiling water for various purposes, the chief of which is making tea. Of this the Eskimos are very fond. Often the only duty devolving upon the wife in the preparation of the meal is to make tea. Although the Eskimo is not averse to eating his meat raw, this is not always done, for where driftwood is plentiful, the meat is often boiled in large iron pots and thus served. Knives, forks, or spoons are seldom used. The Eskimo is of the opinion that nature has provided him with every requisite for the handling of his food, and he finds the use of his fingers much less complicated than anything to which he has yet been introduced.

Since the duties of the Eskimo wife in connection with her household are neither many nor arduous, one might well wonder how the women occupy their time. It is needless wonderment, however, for the duties that fall to her lot are far from few. When the hunter has succeeded in killing a seal or walrus and has delivered the dead animal at the encampment, he considers his duty manfully done. It is the woman's work to skin the animal and cut it up. The blubber and meat will require little attention, but the hide must be cleaned and stretched over a frame, in order that it may be rubbed and dried properly. The woman's work increases in exactly the proportion of her family wealth, for that is represented by the ability of her husband as a hunter. When the skins have been properly cured, it is the woman's work to make them into winter clothes and boots. These latter are not only for the use of the Eskimos themselves, but find considerable favor among other dwellers along the coast, for they are both cheap and serviceable. The Newfoundland fishermen who visit the coast each summer, buy large quantities of them; in fact, hundreds of pairs are sent to the markets at St. Johns, Newfoundland.

Ingenuity has come to the rescue of the women in connection with the baking of bread, and the method employed is a very novel one, indeed. As anything approaching a proper baking-oven is out of the question in their camps, the women and children collect a pile of driftwood and make a fire on a sandy beach; when the sand has become sufficiently hot, the fire is carefully scraped away, and the dough placed in the sand and completely covered. In this way the bread is baked most beautifully!

One of the greatest events in the lives of these simple people is the visit of the missionary. He arrives with sledge and dogs, or in summer by water, and spends a day or two at the settlement. All events, both great and small, are related to him and his advice sought. For the time being all work is suspended. The rifle, harpoon and kayak, the sledge-dog, seals and walrus alike have a holiday, for the time is spent in hunting imperishable riches and in providing food for the soul. How attentively these men, women and children listen to the Word of God, and how naively they question the missionary at the end of the simple but impressive service, testify of their true hunger for better things.

In June the heat of the sun becomes sufficient to melt the snow on land and to cause the breaking up of the great fields of ice which have formed in the bays and along the coast. We long to see Jack Frost loosen his grasp and again leave land and sea free from cold and ice. In summer there is more life, more variety and more stimulus in the scenery and in the entire life of this northern land. Once the ice has left us, large numbers of schooners ply the waters along the coast to carry on the fishing industries.

With the coming of summer begins our time of greatest opportunity and greatest activity. From Newfoundland a great many schooners, sometimes from 1,500 to 2,000, visit our coast, and each of these vessels has a crew of six to twelve men. Most of these fishermen are brave-hearted, honest and God-fearing men. They do not usually fish on Sundays, and whenever possible they will attend services held at the Mission Station. Along the coast-line of several hundred miles, however, there are many harbors and only a few of these are within reach of the station. It has been our earnest desire to visit the more distant harbors and there conduct services among these hardy Newfoundlanders. In spite of the fact that summer brings its warm weather and calm seas, it is not often feasible to make these long trips in an open boat. In order to carry on this work efficiently, we need a motor-launch. With this we would not only be able to visit the Newfoundland fishermen on their fishing-grounds, but also our own special charges, the Eskimos, who regularly leave us in the summer and take up their abode upon the islands and along the outlying headlands in order to be near the fishing-grounds.

The Genial Side of Peace

IT HAS happily fallen to Andrew Carnegie not only to pave the way to peace with gold and silver, but to take away from the movement much of its sober-sided aspect and to give it a certain popular, social éclat and attractiveness which it did not before possess. This is fortunate, and the old ironmaster, in the enjoyable turn he gave to the recent banquet to Baron de Constant, showed both worldly wisdom and good taste. There is no reason why the Peace Movement should not be from this time forth the most universally popular idea on two continents. Let us educate toward peace by all means; but let us not forget that it is rich in the promise of better things for all peoples in all lands. Even if war cannot yet be wholly abolished and if fleets and hosts must persist until the "good time" when swords shall be beaten into plowshares and spears into pruning-hooks, still we have much to rejoice over in the knowledge that we are doing our share to hasten the realization of the world's desire—"peace on earth."

The Anti-Trust Decision

IT IS not surprising that there should be wide differences in the point of view concerning the effect of the latest Supreme Court decision in the famous Standard Oil case. So able and logical a thinker as Justice Harlan, in his dissenting opinion, has declared that Congress alone has the power to limit or restrict the application of the Sherman Anti-Trust Act to "unreasonable monopolies," and has pointed to the fact that the Supreme Court on previous occasions has twice refused so to construe it.

The Anti-Trust Act was created to meet commercial and financial conditions at a time when vast monopolistic combinations threatened the public welfare. It was a drastic law, making no distinctions as to degrees of violation. The Supreme Court has seen fit to modify the previous uniform literal interpretation of this law. A majority of the justices in their decision tacitly recognize the fact that all business combinations are not necessarily criminal, and that a clearer definition is needed in the interest of justice and for the protection of legitimate trade. Broadly interpreted, the new decision means that business may be carried on by individuals or corporations with perfect freedom of contract, as long as it is conducted with due recognition of law and along the lines of honorable commerce. It recognizes the right to free competition, but where such competition develops into "unreasonable restraint" of trade or undue interference with the rights of competitors, the offender comes into conflict with the law.

Standard Oil is the first great monopoly to come under the operation of this new interpretation. There are many worthy people who think that this old monopolistic offender has been too lightly dealt with, but this is a matter we can safely afford to leave to the Supreme Court. For forty years, this corporation has been growing until it has attained gigantic proportions. Absorbing, either by purchase or by the crushing-out process, most of its rivals, it has made itself master of the petroleum product of this country and of a large portion of the world. It has controlled the output and regulated the market. Taking advantage of every opportunity to increase its power, it became a monopoly of a sort so oppressive that it was soon apparently beyond the reach of regulation or control. Embracing some seventy subsidiary corporations, its affairs directed by men of vast wealth, and with a surplus of some $600,000,000 at command, it was enabled, through sheer capitalistic momentum, to carry out the boldest plans for public exploitage. Pools, trusts, rebates, price cutting, the organization of concerns to pose as independents, and similar devices have all been charged in the government suit, which was first begun in the United States Courts of Missouri five years ago. Though convicted, Standard Oil will pass through the ordeal with little damage; it will simply reorganize and go on, possibly with a closer attention to the law. It has served as an object lesson to other corporations, which must now come under legal scrutiny though with less trepidation, now that it is made clear that no concern whose methods, contracts and combinations are not "unreasonably restrictive of competition" is affected by the decision.

Just how the new interpretation of the Anti-Trust law will work out in other cases where it deals with monopolies, both benignant and malign, will soon be apparent. Meanwhile it is wise to withhold judgment, until the new reading of the old statute is fairly tested. It is a satisfaction to the business interests of the country to have the whole vexed question set at rest, even though it should prove to be only for a season. Our people are not vindictive, and if the new interpretation works out well it will have the public approval.

"Playing Up" Religion

JAMES G. CANNON, president of the Fourth National Bank of New York, addressed the Omaha Ministerial Union, a few days ago, on the "Forward Movement." He is reported as having declared that there is to be an end of muck-raking and that the magazines which have heretofore devoted so much space to articles of this character are to be switched off and made to take up religion. Mr. Cannon, the bank president, spoke very definitely, and seemingly as one having authority, when he said:

> If there is not the greatest ingathering in the churches it will be the fault of the men in charge, for we are going to have the subject of religion so played up in the papers and magazines, that the man who wants to promulgate religion will not have a single excuse for failing to get busy among his friends and neighbors.

Many of the magazines have been changing ownership of late, and there has been much talk of syndicates, made up of great financial interests, gaining control of them for the purpose of stopping the discussion of alleged corporation wrong-doing. Mr. Cannon is not an editor nor a publisher, but a bank president. From what point of information does he speak? Who is "going to have the subject of religion played up"? What kind of "religion" will it be? Will it be the kind the apostle James described when he wrote that "pure religion and undefiled before God and the Father is this, to visit the fatherless and the widows in their affliction, and to keep himself unspotted from the world"? Bank presidents and editors, financial syndicates and independent publishers can give the world none too much of such religion; but we look askance at a religion that is to be "played up" in the spot-light, to attract public attention away from any truth that hurts.

The Contagion of Sympathy

WE ARE far too ready to let the shadow of discouragement creep over us and to cry out upon the world for its hardness and coldness, its gloom and lack of cheer. The truth is that the facts in the case are all the other way. There never was a time when so many silver threads of love and sweet charity bound together people of all sorts and conditions as now. In non-Christian lands little is known of the contagion of sympathy. Dr. Arthur Brown has told us that in a thronged city in the ancient East hundreds of people will pass with utter indifference a man who may have fallen in the street by reason of accident or illness. No one will notice him or lift a finger for his aid unless the good Samaritan in the case happen to be a foreigner whose education has been beneath the banner of the Cross. Similarly a man may fall overboard, and although dozens of boats may be close by, no attempt will be made for his rescue. Sympathy is not indigenous in the human heart. Its seed comes from heaven, and it is sown and thrives and propagates itself in hearts that are watered in dews from above. In Christian lands there are thousands who do not own the name of Christ, yet who, almost without their knowledge, are partakers of some of the finest qualities that belong to him and his disciples. In the large illustrations that occur to us we have only to notice how the world thrills in response to a great need. The contagion of sympathy sets every pulse beating. "One touch of natur makes the whole world kin."

The Gospel Missions Convention

WHAT has proved to be the largest convention o Gospel and Rescue Mission workers ever hel in this country concluded its labors in Washingto lately. It was a most representative body. A though the Federation came into being only a fe years ago, and labored under great difficulties, i has already developed into a mighty force for unite Gospel effort. Dealing with a very large class tha is now unreached by the churches, these mission are doing effective service in reaching down to th lowest social depths. Their labors are among th waifs, the outcasts of humanity, the derelicts an castaways. They are working in the byways an the hedges and by the strong persuasive argument of brotherly and sisterly love and Christlike sym pathy are literally "compelling them to come in. When Jerry McAuley, after his conversion, bega his work as an apostle to the outcast and the crim inal, he set up a standard which many believe would have few followers. But the magnificen gathering of consecrated men and women at th Federation Congress proves how far wrong wa this estimate of the spiritual value and the grea need of more men like McAuley. Like Paul, thes men and women of the Federation are willing to b "all things to all men" so they may win souls fo Christ. Rescue mission workers seek little hono or recognition in the worldly sense. They sink sel altogether in their work. Their work is of a cha acter that makes the strongest kind of appeal fo Christian support. With sincere gratification w look back to the time when THE CHRISTIAN HERALI in the early days of the Federation, was privilege to assist it over the rough places until it was fairl launched. There were difficulties to surmoun obstacles to overcome; but we never doubted it future and we rejoice in its growth and increasin usefulness. We trust to see the Federation gro stronger and stronger until no single mission is out side the organization. All honor to the men an women who are thus spending their lives for other They deserve our prayers and our generous help i their efforts to redeem the erring and to lift up th fallen.

Six Thousand in Police Parade

THERE are 10,000 policemen in New York City, more than 6,000 of whom marched down Fifth Avenue on the afternoon of May 13 om Seventy-ninth Street to Washington Square the annual parade. Fully 200,000 persons turned ıt to witness the march. Divisions representing fferent branches of the police service were led by score of bands, and the men's splendid physique ıd handsome uniforms made a splendid appearance ıd impression. On the reviewing stand at Madi-n Square were Governor Dix, Mayor Gaynor, eneral Frederick Dent Grant, Rear-Admiral E. . C. Leutze, Police Commissioner Cropsey, Nathan :raus, Fire Commissioner Waldo, Street Cleaning ommissioner Edwards, John D. Crimmins, and hers. There were men on horseback, on wheels ıd afoot, guardians of the streets, parks, bridges, aterfronts. The veterans, few in number, white-iired, none under sixty-five years of age, were plauded everywhere along the line. For the first me in the annual parade, police dogs appeared, velve of them, four abreast, beside twelve patrol-en who held them by straps. The dogs all wore hite muzzles. Before the parade reached Madison quare Mayor Gaynor went through the ceremony pinning medals on the uniforms of six policemen ho had won them. These men were Andrew Gel-rman, Lieutenant James M. Wheelwright, August hrimp, Martin S. Owens, William P. Beecher, and ustave Boettler. The layor in presenting ıe medals made a ıort address compli-ıenting them as the nest force in the orld and justifying is administration of ıe police department. n physical prowess, ntellectual ability, ersonal integrity and ourage, the 10,000 of lew York's police orce will compare ıore than favorably ith those of most of he cities of the world. n New York, as in all ities, the efficiency of he police force will epend upon the char-cter of the man or ıen who control them, he best service only eing rendered when here is freedom from olitical manipulation nd corrupt domina-ion. Some of the truest and best men and Chris-ians we have ever known have belonged to the New ork police force. No sympathy can be deep enough or words of commendation strong enough for the oble men who every hour of the day or night are isking their lives for the protection of the property nd lives of their fellow-men. The custom of polic-ng the cities in ancient times is here suggested.

The watchmen that go about the city found me: to whom I said, aw ye him whom my soul loveth? (Sol. Song 3:3.)

abulous Farm Wealth

From the statement of the Agricultural Depart-nent at Washington, we learn that the value of the vealth produced on farms of the United States dur-ng 1910 was $8,926,000,000. This is an increase f $104,000,000 over the year 1909. It is a matter f surprise to many that Texas and not Illinois tood at the head of the line of all the States in the alue of its principal farm products, which aggre-ated $364,110,000. It was her 10,000,000 acres of otton which enabled her to do so. It is beginning o dawn upon the minds of the people that Texas is destined in the near future to pass all the States of he Union in wealth, population and importance, xcept New York. What a pride comes to the American heart at the production of such fabulous farm products, and what national gratitude should e awakened at the remembrance of God's bounty, nan's enterprise, and the supply of sinews of war or conquering moral evils and establishing the ingdom of God! The agricultural is the basis of ll other industries. Men cannot dig in the mines, work in the factories, plow the seas, toil with their ands or travel over the land, until the farms shall ave first furnished them something to eat and to ear. The outlook thus far is very flattering for n even more bountiful harvest in 1911 than the one whose fabulous record we have just mentioned. The promise of the Lord to the children of Zion of spiritual things was preceded by the prophecy of bountiful harvests that were to be sent.

And the floors shall be full of wheat, and the fats shall overflow with wine and oil. (Joel 2:24.)

Snakes and Suit-case

Raymond L. Ditmars, curator of the Bronx Zoo, appeared at an entertainment of the Rocky Mountain Club at the Waldorf Astoria in New York the other night with a suit-case full of snakes as specimens. After the entertainment the curator gave his suit-case of serpents into the care of Zayas, manager of the club, promising to send a man for it the next day, which he did. When the man returning with his suit-case opened it in the reptile house, he removed some underclothing, two shirts, and several collars and cuffs, but no snakes were there. Elmer A. D. Pue, a member of the Rocky Mountain Club, bought a ticket for Washington and was about to retire to his sleeping berth when, opening his suit-case, the heads of half a dozen snakes popped out, swinging to and fro, hissing and darting out their tongues. Pue clapped the lid down instantly, wrapped his overcoat around the case and got off at Harrison, the first stop, and hurried back to telephone Zayas, who immediately communicated with Mr. Ditmars and found that the suit-cases had been exchanged, and that the wearing apparel was at the snake-house and the snakes were at the place his wearing apparel should have been. The suit-cases were again exchanged and it was found that there was no damage either to the snakes or to the clothing. Many of the mistakes of life and some that are the most far-reaching are the result of carelessness. Watchfulness and diligence are necessary in the divine life that we may be enabled to avoid error and pursue the pathway of truth. The Good Book enjoins this vigilance in these words:

Blessed is the man that heareth me, watching daily at my gates, waiting at the posts of my doors. For whoso findeth me findeth life, and shall obtain favor of the Lord. (Prov. 8:34, 35.)

Wandering Jews

Many immigrants have been sent back home on the ground that they were likely to become charges upon the public. One by one certain Russian Jews were deported until a company of seventeen had gathered at Rotterdam, from which place they were sent back to Russia. Russia would not receive them and the German Government hurried them back to Rotterdam as swiftly as possible. At Rotterdam these seventeen sailed for America on the steamship Volturno of the Uranian Steamship Line, reaching New York City again. They have been under the care and expense of the Uranian Line, which was responsible for their coming. America does not want these poor creatures, and will not have them; but Commissioner Williams, it is said, intends to have them sent back on the Russian-American Line to Libau, where Russia will be compelled to accept them. It seems a pity that these poor creatures should thus have to wander, but certain steamship lines and governments have united in dumping upon our shores more than our share of imbeciles and criminals, and Congress did perfectly right in putting up the bars a little higher against these undesirables. The wandering of these seventeen men is a new role for the Hebrew. He has always been a wanderer in the earth, but in quest of land, knowledge and coin, and has generally gotten what he went after. There are very few Jewish mendicants. No people take better care of their poor than the Jews. America says to the seventeen wandering Jews what the king said to Ittai:

Return to thy place, and abide with the king; for thou art a stranger, and also an exile. (II. Sam. 15:19.)

Victoria Memorial Unveiled

The memorial to Queen Victoria, on whose construction workmen have been employed for nine years in front of Buckingham Palace, was unveiled May 16 amid scenes of pomp and royal splendor. King George and Queen Mary of England, Emperor William and the Empress of Germany walked from Buckingham Palace to the scene of the unveiling amidst the cheers of the multitude. The King and the Emperor, in the uniform of British field marshals, decorated with many medals, walked side by side, followed by the English Queen and the German Empress, and close behind the royal consorts walked Princess Victoria of Prussia and other members of the royalty. The royal party ascended the steps of an especially constructed dais on the palace side of Victoria Gardens, where they remained through the ceremonies. Three thousand visitors were allotted seats in a semi-circle in the Victoria Gardens. The general public gathered in crowds in the mall behind lines of soldiers. Queen Victoria was one of the greatest rulers England ever had, or that any nation of modern times has had. She was the highest ideal of womanhood, of Christian motherhood. Personally and officially she was the product of England's best life, and was a most potential factor in its mental, moral, and religious progress during her long reign, and England only honors itself in building this memorial to the great and good Queen. From the earliest times there have been monuments of stone and metal commemorating national events. At the divine command Joshua built a monument to mark the passing of the children of Israel through Jordan.

That this may be a sign among you, that when your children ask their fathers in time to come, saying, What mean ye by these stones? then ye shall answer them, that the waters of Jordan were cut off before the Ark of the Covenant of the Lord; when it passed over Jordan, the waters of Jordan were cut off: and these stones shall be for a memorial unto the children of Israel forever. (Josh. 4:6, 7.)

Generously Rewarded

Miss Carrie Mustica of Newburgh, N. Y., was visiting friends in New York when at the corner of Second Avenue and One Hundred and Ninth Street she saw a richly dressed aged woman seriously dazed with a street car rapidly approaching. The motorman was unable to stop the car, which was just about striking the woman, when Miss Mustica sprang forward, grabbed her and at the risk of her own life dragged the woman out of danger. The woman was so shocked that she fainted in the young lady's arms, and people going by carried her into a drug store, where she recovered consciousness. On doing so she immediately asked the young lady's name and address, which were given. Miss Mustica thought no more of the occurrence, and did not even learn the name of the woman whose life she had saved. The other day Miss Mustica received a letter from an attorney, notifying her that the aged woman had died and had left $60,000 in her will for her. It is seldom that such heroic service brings a material reward. It is perhaps just as well that this should be the case, that there should be no special money premium put on unselfishness or heroism, and yet the fact remains that there are rewards more valuable than stocks, or bonds, or coin, that await deeds and lives of unselfishness and sacrifice. In a Psalm of thanksgiving there is this record:

The Lord rewarded me according to my righteousness; according to the cleanness of my hands hath he recompensed me. (II. Sam. 22:21.)

GOSPEL MISSIONS IN CONVENTION

THE DELEGATES TO THE NATIONAL FEDERATION OF GOSPEL MISSIONS AT WASHINGTON, D. C.

THE Fourth Annual Convention of the National Federation of Gospel Missions met in the Luther Place Memorial Church, Washington, D. C., on May 8. A large number of delegates were in attendance, nearly all the leading Gospel and Rescue Missions of the country being represented. Never has so large a body of Gospel workers in varied fields met in the national capital. Among those present were:

Charleston, S. C.—O. B. Dugan, superintendent Star Gospel Mission.

Morristown, N. J.—Rev. Thomas B. Ironside, superintendent Market Street Mission.

It was a most representative body, and fully justified the expectation of its founders that the Federation would ultimately represent in the widest sense the Gospel Missions of America. Its growth has been phenomenal and the great variety of Gospel and Rescue Work represented was a pleasing surprise to the large audience. Jail Missions, Bible Training Schools, Summer Resort Missions, Missions for Women, Industrial Missions, Jewish Christian Missions, Brotherhoods, Y. M. C. A.'s, Men's Rescue Missions, Salvation Army Work, Missions for Needy Children, Sunshine Missions, Volunteers of America, Sunday School Associations, tract publishing organizations, and unassigned missions all shared in the large and varied programme.

At the opening session, addresses of welcome were delivered by H. B. Warner, chairman; by Rev. Donald C. MacLeod on behalf of the clergy of Washington, by William Knowles Cooper on behalf of the Y. M. C. A. and by Rev. Lloyd C. Douglas, pastor of the Luther Place Memorial Church. Responses were made by Rev. C. H. Madison, President of the Federation, Miss Sara Wray and Mr. T. L. Fretz.

At the second day's session, President Madison presided. Devotional services were held at 9.30 A.M., 2 P.M. and 7.45 P.M. in which many superintendents and workers took part. Addresses were made on various phases of rescue work. In the evening a memorial service was held in honor of the late Jerry McAuley, the founder of Rescue Mission Work. The following day was devoted to addresses of a like varied character and in the evening a memorial service was held in honor of the late Charles N. Crittenton, founder of the Florence Crittenton Mission.

At the invitation of the Washington Gospel Mission, the delegates held a parade and open-air service at midnight in the district at Thirteenth and D Streets Northeast, which drew large crowds of spectators and a deeply interested audience.

An evening memorial service in honor of the late Dr. Louis Klopsch, "the Friend of all Rescue Work," was held on May 13, at which several speakers, including Rev. J. G. Hallimond of the Bowery Mission, paid eloquent tribute to the late editor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, who throughout his whole busy career was an active and liberal supporter of Gospel missions.

The election of officers of the Federation resulted as follows: Sydney Whittemore, of New York president; Tobias L. Fretz, of Philadelphia, Miss Sara Wray, of New York, Henry D. Gordon, O. B Dugan, of Charleston, S. C., F. K. Ward, of Cedar Rapids, Ia., Oliver C. Elliot, of Boston, and George W. Wheeler, vice-presidents; Rev. E. H. Madison of Poughkeepsie, honorary president and founder. The board of trustees elected consists of Mrs. E. M. Whittemore, New York; John R. McIntyre, Philadelphia; Obadiah Becker, Allentown, Pa.; Dr. C. Yerks, Ossining, N. Y.; H. W. Kline, Mrs. C. H. Madison, Poughkeepsie, N. Y.; John Thompson, Pawtucket, R. I.; Rev. J. G. TOPICS OF INTEREST THROUGHOUT THE WORLD

—PARSEVAL II., the new German military dirigible balloon, while returning from a trial flight on May 17 was blown against the hangar and wrecked. Two passengers on board the airship suffered sprained ankles. The sixth Zeppelin dirigible, the Deutschland, was wrecked in similar fashion only a few days before this accident.

—THE REV. J. H. JOWETT, pastor of the Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church, New York, and formerly minister of Carr's Lane Congregational Church, Birmingham, will be the guest of King George at the coronation ceremonies on June 22 in the Abbey Church of St. Peter, Westminster. The Abbey coronation committee was unable to find room in the church for the distinguished preacher, and when the King heard that all the seats had been filled he placed one of his own chairs at the disposal of Dr. Jowett.

—A COURIER who recently left Tangier, Morocco, for Fez returned on May 17, and reported that he was unable to get within ten miles of the southern capital, having been turned back May 15 by the rebellious tribesmen. A fierce battle was waging around Fez. The Sultan's troops were engaging the rebels in the environs, both sides fighting desperately. The rebels admitted having suffered heavy losses. All road communication out of Fez is cut, and couriers are menaced with death.

—RATIFICATION OF THE protocol referring the long standing boundary dispute between Costa Rica and Panama to the arbitration of the Chief Justice of the United States were exchanged in Washington on May 17 by the ministers of the two countries. Arguments in the case will soon begin. The protocol was negotiated under the friendly offices of the United States in March, 1910, and the disputed territory involves valuable banana lands.

—GERMAN EXPLORERS at Elephantine, Egypt, have made some remarkable discoveries. They have found a number of papyri of a date approximately 471 to 408 B.C. or 1,500 years older than the oldest existing Hebrew parchment of the Bible. They tell of a great temple to Jehovah at Elephantine, and of events in the days of Sanballat and of Cambyses. It should here be noted that Winckler and others of the "higher critics" had declared Sanballat a legendary character; but these papyrus leaves, with their inscriptions, show him to have been a real personage. It is said that household documents have been found at Elephantine which go back to the twenty-sixth and twenty-seventh centuries B.C., while in Nubia, which was once inhabited by Egyptians, records have been discovered that are believed to date from 4,000 B.C.

—IN MANY PARTS OF ENGLAND there have been during the last few weeks more or less outspoken protests against the activities of the Mormon missionaries who are at work in various sections of the country. These protests have at last taken concrete form and the religious sentiment of some districts is greatly aroused. At Birkenhead the anti-Mormon campaign led to serious disorders on Easter Sunday. An organized demonstration against Mormonism was carried out, and an ultimatum was issued requesting the Mormon missionaries to quit the town within eight days. Later a great crowd attacked the Mormon meeting house, and stoned the windows. The police had great difficulty in restoring order. Two persons were injured and five were arrested. An anti-Mormon campaign was organized at Liverpool by the Bishop of that city and other prominent churchmen. The object was the expulsion from England of the Mormon missionaries, who were charged with sending many recruits, chiefly girls, to the United States. The movement was taken up by the clergy of other cities.

SPEEDING THE ENVOY OF PEACE

THE FIRST BANQUET OF THE BOARD OF INTERNATIONAL HOSPITALITY, GIVEN IN HONOR OF BARON D'ESTOURNELLES DE CONSTANT

THE Board of International Hospitality came into being as a subsidiary of the New York Peace Society on the evening of May 17, when Mr. Andrew Carnegie presided at a dinner given in honor of Baron d'Estournelles de Constant, the French Senator and peace advocate who has been touring the United States. About two hundred people, including many of New York's most distinguished men and women, gathered in one of the beautiful banquet halls of the Hotel Astor to honor the gifted traveler.

Dr. Nicholas Murray Butler, president of Columbia University, introduced Baron de Constant, and paid a glowing tribute to his enthusiasm and ability.

"The new relations between nations," Dr. Butler said, "haven't happened by chance. The interdependence of nations caused by education, travel, commerce and finance has been instrumental, but more has been done by persistent, persuasive, intelligent work. And no man has been more active in and out of season than our guest. He has been heard in Russia, Germany, Scandinavia and in this country, and now South America and Japan are asking for him."

"Perhaps you aren't surprised at the existence of a board of foreign hospitality," said the Baron when his greeting had subsided. "But how new it is! I must go back to France and tell them that they shall have to hasten. In the past seventy or eighty days I have been everywhere in your country, speaking and listening, and oh! if I could just speak French to tell you what I thought of Los Angeles, of San Francisco, of the many other cities! Everywhere there is a different kind of people, everywhere a different climate, and still it is all the same. There is no party; it is a nation.

"About peace I shall simply say that it is not enough for us to sign treaties with our signatures. We must sign them with our hearts. We are not ready yet for arbitration. We must first have conciliation. We must not wait until the peril is great to settle our difficulties. Toward conciliation you are far ahead of us. You have 57,000 people interested in the periodical of the peace movement. We have but 1,000." Of Mr. Carnegie he said: "It is just as necessary to prepare for peace as it is to prepare for war. You have not only given. You have done, sir. You have not only fought; you have done much to stop war.

"It is a fine thing that my people in Paris do not say, 'Why is our Senator not representing his constituents instead of absenting himself in America?' They know the vast world-wide significance of our work for peace, and they know my work here represents them, and unselfishly support me in continuing absent to engage in it, even here so far away from my regular duties. This is my thanksgiving day, and it makes me very happy thus to leave your shores after my ten weeks of campaigning here."

President John H. Finley, of the College of the City of New York, said in beginning his speech that he had not been invited to the dinner, but merely notified while in Paris that he was to be present and make a few remarks. Dr. Finley has recently been lecturing at the Sorbonne, Paris, and returning full of enthusiasm gave splendid tribute to the France of art, of learning and discovery; back into which runs the history of our own land through Champlain, Cartier, and Marquette. When Dr. Finley had finished, Adolphe Cohn, professor of romance languages at Columbia, made a speech in French to the delight of the guests.

Dr. Henry van Dyke, of Princeton University, began in the mood of good-natured humor which marked the entire evening. He described the event as "a gastronomic adjunct to the cause of universal peace"; then, after gazing at the array of fair women and famous men about him, he decided he might also describe the banquet not as a gastronomical contribution but as something astronomical. Then becoming serious he said:

"Suppose Senator Root were to go over to France and be entertained at the house of our guest. Suppose they entered into an argument and decided that the only way they could settle their difficulties would be the duello.

"C'est impossible, n'est pas?" he asked, turning to the Baron.

"I hope so," was the cheerful answer of the French Senator.

"If for individuals why not for nations too?" continued the Princeton professor. "A war may settle the life or death of a nation, but it does not settle the question at stake."

In addition to the speakers there were at the head table William Frederick Dix, T. Tileston Wells, Francis Lynde Stetson and Professor Samuel T. Dutton. Some of the others in the room were William H. Short, secretary of the society; General Daniel E. Sickles, Mr. and Mrs. Henry W. Taft, Mr. and Mrs. Ernest Thompson Seton, William G. McAdoo, Horace White, R. Fulton Cutting, Carl Lorentzen, Mrs. Kate Upson Clark, Mr. and Mrs. Hamilton Holt, Mr. and Mrs. Lindsay Russell, General and Mrs. Stewart L. Woodford, Jules P. Storm, Mr. and Mrs. Henry Clews and Antonio Zucca.

The success of the evening proved a great delight to Mr. Carnegie, who joked and chuckled like a delighted schoolboy in introducing the speakers. Just before the gathering broke up he said: "If this were in Scotland—not a large country, but still on the map—it would not break up without singing 'Auld Lang Syne.'" So all rose and sang a verse of the song while the great ironmaster gesticulated and led the chorus. It was his evening and he seemed to enjoy it to the full.

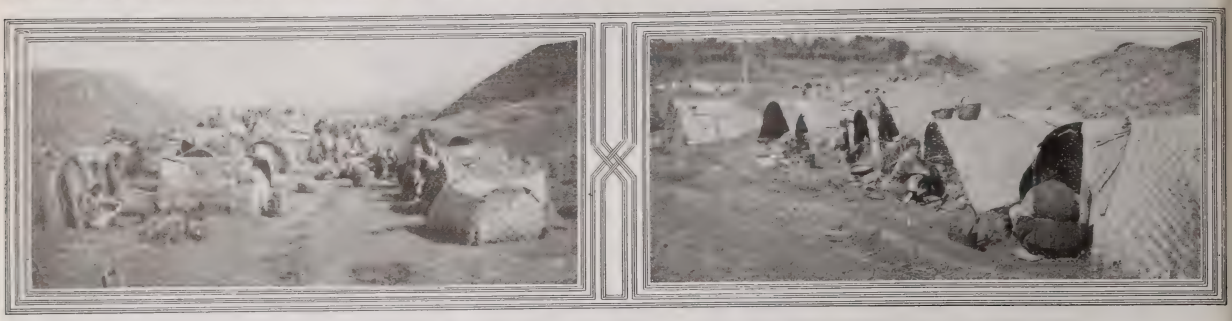
Russia Remembers Dr. Klopsch

I BEG to thank you most sincerely for the copy of the memorial volume of the Life Work of Louis Klopsch, whose memory will always remain fresh in my mind. I remember with especial pleasure Dr. Klopsch's visit to Russia in June, 1892, when he delivered in the steamer Leo a cargo of grain for the inhabitants of the famine-stricken districts. I was one of those to whom the distribution of this assistance was entrusted and remember with what feelings of deep gratitude and blessing this donation was received.

The Finns will also not forget the visit Dr. Klopsch paid them in 1902, and the assistance given them at that time, when this country likewise suffered from a failure of the crops.



Your excellent work will serve as a worthy remembrance of the philanthropic activity of Dr. Klopsch, whom I greatly esteem. Yours very sincerely,

COUNT ANDRE BOBRINSKY.

Relief Work in China Reviewed

THE GREAT GOOD THAT HAS BEEN ACCOMPLISHED BY AMERICAN CHARITY

FAMINE REFUGEES AND THEIR MAT HUTS IN THE GREAT CAMP ON THE OUTSKIRTS OF CHIN-KIANG

FOR nearly five months the good people of our Christian land have been deeply interested in the great struggle with famine that has been going on in several provinces of China. Famine conditions began to be experienced in the closing months of 1910, but the situation did not grow really acute until the beginning of the present year. When the appeal came from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD missionary committee in Chin-kiang, supplemented by that of the official committee in Shanghai, the whole world knew that the two provinces of Anhui and Kiang-su were again in the grasp of a famine as severe as that which visited them in 1907.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD readers, ever quick to respond to the call of human suffering, sent in their contributions. Beginning with small sums they gradually increased in volume until they poured in like a very torrent of benevolence. Churches, Sunday Schools, missionary societies, Christian Endeavorers, Epworth Leaguers, Young People's Unions were all represented in this great charity. Their gifts were consecrated with prayer that not only lives might be saved and bodies fed, but that the spiritual result might greatly add to the triumph of the Gospel in China. We have every reason to believe that these prayers have been gloriously answered.

Up to the present time, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has sent $100,000 to China by direct cable remittances through our State Department in Washington, every dollar of which has been faithfully expended in feeding the starving multitudes. Our published letters during the past four months show how greatly these gifts have been appreciated by the missionaries and their co-workers. Our CHRISTIAN HERALD contributors were represented by 21,000 sacks of flour in the cargo of the Buford, purchased with $21,000 of the Fund money. That cargo, which arrived when the suffering was at its height, and when men and women were dying of fever and starvation, was a tremendous reinforcement for the relief workers. The Chinese authorities—who deserve credit for the splendid work they have been doing in life-saving ever since the beginning of the famine—welcomed the Buford and paid high honors to her captain and officers as the representatives of Christian America and the bearers of this great benevolence. The Shanghai Times of April 3 tells of this welcome and says:

"The consignment of flour unloaded at Chin-kiang was sent out by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, of New York, and was in sacks bearing the name of the paper. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has done magnificent work in the past in China, having raised a large fund at the time of the last famine, and its efforts to relieve the suffering of the starving are worthy of the warmest recognition."

Rev. W. C. Longden, former Chairman of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Missionary Committee at Chin-kiang, is now in the United States on furlough for the first time in seven years. Mr. Longden spoke in warm terms of the relief work of the Chinese themselves, both the official and non-official classes. The "gentry" in the two afflicted provinces were the first to make liberal advances from their own personal means to begin the relief work, and the government supplemented these with far larger appropriations than had ever before been given during a famine. These gifts were stimulated by the example of foreign generosity during the previous famine, notably by the remarkable work done during the famine of 1907 with the fund raised through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Such liberality from the Christian people across the sea had thus produced a two-fold confidence of the Chinese people themselves by showing them the kindness of the Christian nations in their time of distress, and it aroused the admiration and respect of the official classes to the highest degree, inducing them to come more promptly and liberally to the relief of their own people in the present famine.

Nor was this good influence confined to the famine problem alone, Mr. Longden explained, for it was reflected in the whole attitude of Chinese officialdom towards the missionaries and made their work more successful in every way. It removed their original prejudice against missionary orphanages for the famine waifs and made the establishment of these orphanages a comparatively easy task. Much of their success is due to this change of heart on the part of the Chinese officials towards Christian missions and missionary workers.

A Tragedy of the Famine

FAMINE NOTES

—IN NORTHERN Anhui 300,000 persons and in Northern Kiang-su 160,000 were being cared for by the Central China Famine Relief Fund on April 7.

—ON APRIL 12, Missionary E. C. Lobenstine wrote to Chairman Walker of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Missionary Committee in Chin-kiang: "Our last distribution should be in the hands of the people not later than the middle of May, and preferably from a week to ten days before that. . . . It is to be one grand hustle from now on to the end."

—THE Buford proceeded from Chin-kiang to Nanking and discharged the balance of her cargo at the Pukow wharf. The cargo unloaded at Pukow was carried as far as Ling Hwai Kwan and there transferred to boats which go up the Hwai River and reach the most destitute centres—Hwai Quan, Pochow, Koyang, etc. There the flour was handed over to the local committees composed of two Chinese local headmen and one or two missionaries. The general plan adopted is to support as large a number of families as possible until the harvest. The Tientsin-Pukow Railway placed forty cars at the disposal of the Relief Committee for transferring the flour free of charge to the famine district.

—DR. COCHRAN and Rev. D. B. Morris, missionaries engaged in the relief work, are much better. During their illness, it was touching to see the interest shown by the people of Hwai-yuan. One day fifty men went to one of the temples and prayed for Dr. Cochran's recovery. A written petition signed by fifty persons offering to give one year of each of their lives was presented to their idol!

On page 551 of this issue is a tabulated statement of the remittances sent through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to the two relief committees to date. Detailed reports of the disbursements in the famine field have been promised by the committees later. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S China Relief Fund closes May 31.

Mr. James Tanis of Paterson, N. J., sent to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD a few days ago a letter enclosing a check for $180.31, being the final contribution to the China Famine Fund from the Sunday Schools, societies and congregations of the Christian Reformed Church in America. This makes a total of $5,181.52 contributed through this source, and is the highest record reached by any organization in the present famine relief work. Mr. Tanis' letter concludes: "May the Lord bless all the contributors, the recipients and all who are in any way connected with this great undertaking, and we pray that God's name may be praised among the heathen, and many hungry souls led to the Bread of Life."

One Woman's Faithful Service

By HOWARD C. SMITH

FOR thirty-one years, the Boydton Institute has kept its halls open for learning, to the delight and benefit of many young colored people. For thirty of these years, Mrs. Helen B. Sharp has carried the main burden of the work, and now at the age of seventy-two she still lives in a cottage on the campus. God has greatly honored her faithful ministry and that of those associated with her, and it has honored him and been an honor to his cause.

It has ever been the object of the workers to bring the scholars to Christ and to impart a knowledge of the Word, together with a sufficient secular education to fit them for useful lives. Over two hundred have graduated, and many others have received much help, although not finishing the course. Many ministers and teachers are graduates of the Boydton Institute.

A minister said to the writer not long ago: "The colored people here are the most polite I have ever met anywhere." And it is the uniform testimony of the white people that the influence of the work thus established has been to raise the moral tone of the community.

Mrs. Sharp's girlhood home was in Binghamton, N. Y. Before the Civil War she taught in the home of some of her friends in the South. After her marriage to Mr. Sharp, they worked for a number of years for the education of the freedmen under the American Board, organizing schools and churches. When Dr. Charles Cullis of Boston bought the old Randolph Macon College buildings to open a school for colored people, Mr. and Mrs. Sharp were engaged to begin the work.

Substantial buildings were put up in 1852 by the Southern Methodist Conference. All the material and workmanship were good; but during the war they were used as barracks, and later to house freed slaves. Some of the buildings were afterward torn down and sold; but the main building and teachers' hall were left. Dr. Cullis purchased the whole ninety acres of campus and three hundred acres of woodland for about $6,200. The first cost had been $80,000 for the main building alone. The buildings were repaired and partially furnished, and Mr. and Mrs. Sharp began teaching with a few day scholars, who rapidly increased to fifty the first year, and soon after to over a hundred. Mr. Sharp only lived one year to co-operate in this work. Mrs. Sharp has continued effectively at work in her chosen field to this day. Although weak in body, yet in mind and spirit she is active, and she has a lively interest in all that relates to the work.

As we look on this old lady's benevolent face and think how God has cared for her and her four fatherless children, we cannot but feel that in her case the promise to add all other things to those who "seek first the kingdom" has been fully verified. Her career shows God's faithfulness in answering to faithful effort, and its recital may bring glory to God by inspiring others to do likewise.

AMONG THE WORKERS AT HOME AND ABROAD

—MISSION WORKERS all over the country are enthusiastically discussing the recent Federation Convention in Washington. Chairman George W. Wheeler of the Gospel Mission in Washington (which has just celebrated its fifth anniversary—the close of the best year in its history), says of the Federation: "The Convention has given an impetus to our Gospel Mission and we shall go into the new year with greater faith in God and with more earnest purpose to reach and rescue the lost men and women of our city."

—A VERY serviceable volume of Prayers for Public Worship, Private Devotion and Personal Ministry, is published at $1 by M. E. Munson, publisher, Bible House, New York. It is a book suited to all occasions, and will be a valuable aid to workers and to private families.

—THE MOODY BIBLE INSTITUTE of Chicago, Ill., extends an invitation to Christian workers to attend the Fifth Annual Conference on Summer Work June 6-8. Full information will be furnished on application to A. F. Gaylord, 153 Institute Place, Chicago, Illinois.

—THE UNIVERSITY SETTLEMENT of New York City has just acquired by gift of Mrs. Joseph Howland of Newport, R. I., an estate of 225 acres at Fishkill-on-Hudson, N. Y., which is admirably suited for the summer work of the Settlement. The Settlement is now trying to raise $7,500 to maintain and equip the camp.

—REV. CONDILLAC JEAN-JACQUES, pastor of the Union Baptist Church of Cape Hayti, is now in New York. He received his theological training in this country, and since 1897 has labored faithfully as a pastor in his native land. Seven years he spent in his native town, Port-de-Paix, until the fire of February, 1902, burned his church there and scattered the flock to the adjoining towns. He then moved to Cape Hayti and became pastor of the Union Baptist Church, which he has served faithfully ever since. The membership is about forty and the outlook is promising. Teachers, missionaries, colporteurs, etc., are sorely needed. Pastor Jacques is here to enlist the financial support of the American churches and people in the spread of the Gospel in Hayti. He may be addressed care of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

—LAST FALL Evangelist Sunday came to New Castle, Pa., and held services for six weeks. After that the men organized a Men's Personal Workers' League. Men who work in the mills, lawyers and merchants, men who never expected to speak in public, now go to the nearby towns to hold meetings. The awakening in New Castle is wonderful. The sort of results accomplished are shown in the following newspaper clipping: "Attorney C. Henry Akens is reported having notified his former clients that hereafter he will be unavailable as counsel in license court. Mr. Akens is admitted one of the foremost attorneys in this county. He took a more serious view of Christianity as a result of the Sunday campaign here."

—THE OUT-DOOR evangelistic meetings under the care of the National Bible Institute, New York, for this season, began on April 24, at Madison Square and Twenty-fourth Street, with a large attendance. During the year ending March 31, there were conducted under the auspices of the National Bible Institute about 2,000 evangelistic meetings in New York, in three Gospel halls and out-doors.

—THE CHURCHES of Montgomery, Ala., have recently had a Bible Conference extending eight days, in which Dr. James M. Gray, Dean of Moody Bible Institute, was the principal teacher, with him being associated Dr. W. Irving Carroll, of Texarkana, and Dr. L. W. Munhall of Germantown.

—MR. WILLIAM ELLINGER of Lincoln, Neb., for many years a subscriber to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, died on December 4, 1910. Although a very busy man he always managed to find time to lend a helping hand to the poor and needy. When THE CHRISTIAN HERALD asked for help for the famine-stricken people of India, Mr. Ellinger was one of the first to make up a car load of provisions and at the same time contributed liberally from his own pockets. Each year he contributed to the support and education of the blind orphans in China. In this "personal work" he took great pleasure and last summer, realizing that his time here must be short, he turned over to his daughter a sum of money with instructions that it be used to complete the seven years' course of a seventeen-year-old orphan boy whom he had been supporting and educating for the last three years.

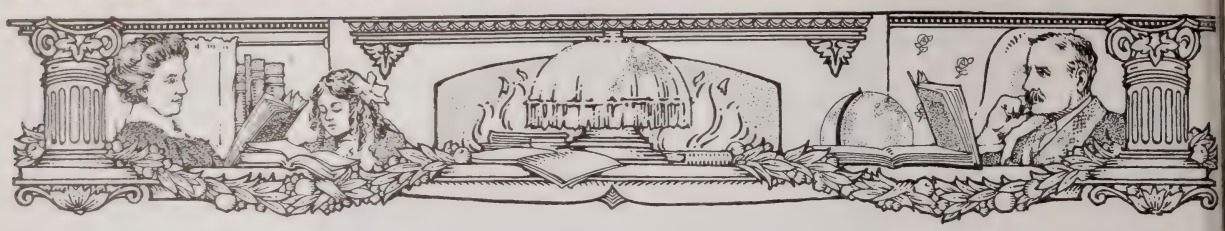
—EVANGELISTS HART AND MAGANN closed a five weeks' series of union services in Barberton, O., early in February. The services resulted in over six hundred professed conversions, among them being many young men. Church members were revived and strengthened and many church letters that have lain in trunks since the owners moved to the factory town were brought forth and handed in to the various churches. Evangelist Hart preached the plain, heart-searching Gospel, and Mr. Magann by his leadership of a chorus of 250 voices and his solos was a powerful feature of the revival. The people of Barberton are very grateful for the privilege of having had this visit from these helpful men. MRS. C. B. R.

—THE NEW SOUTH REFORMED CHURCH in New York was used for the first time for public worship Sunday, April 30. The new edifice is situated at Park Avenue and Eighty-fifth Street, and the services were conducted by the Rev. Dr. Thomas Reed Bridges. The congregation has abandoned the old church at Madison Avenue and Thirty-eighth Street, and mortgaged the property, which was appraised at between $700,000 and $800,000. The money raised was used to erect the new church, which has taken two years in building. The church, Sunday School building and parish house represent an outlay of almost $500,000.

—THE ORGANIZATION known as the United Christian Workers of America is planning to acquire a building in upper New York for the broadening of their work. Rev. W. H. Collison is leader of the mission, with headquarters at 728 East 222d Street, New York City.

—AT THE Indian Creek Baptist Church, Mill Run, Pa., on Sunday, May 7, after the sermon two aged men presented themselves for baptism, and twenty-five who had been baptized presented themselves for the right hand of fellowship. Three generations of one family were in the class, the oldest seventy and the youngest ten years.

—REV. A. ANDERSON, of the Scandinavian Mission, Vrijheid, Natal, South Africa, writes: "Ninety-seven persons have been received into full membership since our work began. A little more than three years ago another station was started at Pantpietersburg, twenty-eight miles from here, where Mr. and Mrs. Rosene have been laboring. They have now two preaching places and sixteen members. This station here in Vrijheid has one outstation and three preaching places where the Gospel is proclaimed every Sunday. About thirty boys attend our evening school. Most of them have been won for Christ."



—PHYSICIANS who devote a great deal of time to the study of tuberculosis assert that the white plague will be practically eradicated in another hundred years. This is the keynote of the remarks that were addressed to churchgoers from the pulpits of 200,000 churches in the last few days. Last year a Sunday was selected for sermons on tuberculosis, and it is also planned to have the disease discussed from the pulpits again this year. Last year some 40,000 sermons were preached on the prevention of tuberculosis, and the National Association for the Study and Prevention of Tuberculosis hopes to enlist all the 33,000,000 church members in the country in their movement.

Three Thousand Baskets Food for Flames

THE Long Island farmers and market gardeners who dispose of their produce at the Wallabout Market in Brooklyn, N. Y., were given an object lesson on the city's determination to insist upon correct weights and measures when 3,000 "short" bushel baskets were burned in the square before the market on May 17. These baskets were seized in raids made some time ago at the market. John L. Walsh, the Commissioner of Weights and Measures, personally superintended the huge bonfires and has given all those doing business in New York's markets until September 1 to provide new baskets, which are to comply strictly with the law.

TALKS ON THE COOL VERANDA

Women in Council

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

SUMMER is once more with us in its affluent splendor. The dandelions lighted the grass plots with their golden discs a little while ago, and were transformed into ethereal flowers before they faded away. Everywhere to-day the grass is green upon hillside and meadow, the trees are in their thickest foliage, and the birds are singing in the branches. The daisies in their white and gold come back with June, armies and hosts that no man can count; the roses are here again too, and wherever we look we again read the story of life at high tide.

A few months ago our Women's Council must have convened around the fire. To-day we meet on the veranda, with the breezes fanning our faces, the voices of children at play coming to us from open field, and nature whispering to us her everlasting secret of joy and blessing.

Answering Letters When is the best time to answer a letter? Considering a letter as part of a written conversation, the best time to answer it is on the day when it is received. Every one knows that the enthusiasm, sparkle and spontaneity which make correspondence delightful depend altogether on the mood in which one handles the pen. On the first reading of a letter the writer seems to be almost in the room and the words on the page have the cadence and reality of the spoken voice. Put the letter aside for three or four days or three or four weeks and the effort of reply is evident. The effervescence is brushed from the draught, and what was originally cordial and tonic is flat and insipid. The best time to answer a letter is the present time, yet I heard a young girl complain not long ago that she could never keep out of debt to her friends. "They always answer by return mail, and I am as badly off as ever," she asserted with a sigh.

Home news never fails to satisfy the child away from home. Father and mother at home watch and wait for letters from the absent children. Home letters and business letters should be answered at the earliest moment. As for those of comparatively slight importance, such as letters that are merely written to keep up an acquaintance, one may use her discretion. Bread and butter letters obligatory after a visit should be sent within a few days of a guest's return home. It is well in all cases to write the address of the sender on the outside of the envelope, so that in case of a mistake at the post office the missive may not go utterly astray or be forwarded to the dead letter office.

A Lonely Life "Four years ago I lost my dear old home through the division of the estate by the heirs at law. The little flower garden that I made myself fell to my share, here almost under the shadow of the dear old homestead. I built a little cottage in which to spend the few fleeting years of my life, with my flowers only as friends and companions. Our Saviour drew a beautiful illustration from the flowers of the field when he said, 'Consider the lilies how they grow.' E. L."

You are fortunate, dear friend, in having a garden, even if it be a small one, and in continuing to live so near your dear old home that you may see it often. Did you ever read Elizabeth and Her German Garden? I am sure you would enjoy it and appreciate her way of loving the flowers for themselves and planting them in masses. One may get no end of delight out of a little patch of ground if she understands how to coax the flowers to flourish and bloom for her.

Hospital or Home Nursing? A marked change has come over the popular opinion of the hospital as a place in which to be ill and to get well. Formerly, no one who had a home in which to stay thought deliberately of the hospital as a preferable place to seek in a time of illness. The exception, of course, was entertained when a serious operation must be undergone; the opportunities for surgical treatment and subsequent care being manifestly greater in the hospital than in the ordinary household. A generation ago only the mothers among the very poor ever sought a hospital at the birth of an infant. At present, mothers leave homes of the utmost comfort and luxury and pay willingly for the privilege of being cared for a hospital at this critical time, realizing that f mother and child the surroundings are better ar the environment safer than anything that can i offered under the home roof.

Every appliance is at hand in a hospital; phys cians and nurses are ready on the spot with the ministries and their trained and scientific know edge, and let the malady or the occasion be what may the patient's chances for relief and recover are nearly always in excess of those the household can provide. We were once of the opinion that onl loving hands and eyes should watch over the sick We have discovered that love by itself is not enough that love sometimes collapses in the hour of nee and that science and system insure speedier cor valescence and a surer foundation for renewe health. Nevertheless, some of us would rather b at home with less comfort, than absent from it wit more, when we are ill.

Keeping Up Till You Drop "Mother has so much spirit sh never stops working till sh drops." The daughter who mad the statement spoke with no little pride in he mother's stoicism, and the pride was still in he voice when she proceeded to sa that when mother did finally yiel to the claims of a worn-out bod she usually had a long spell of sick ness.

Among the readers of this pag there are, no doubt, other women o Spartan fibre who keep on thei feet, stubbornly resolute, until fin ally nature rebels and a day come when they literally cannot rise fro their beds, and the household is compelled to go on without thei capable hands at the helm. Really dear friends, there is no merit i defying nature. Many a time an ounce of prevention would save the necessity for a pound of cure. Of course, you dislike to be on the invalid list, you dread the expense of the doctor's bill, and you don't like to give trouble to the family. Nevertheless, you have your right to be considered and taken care of, and it would be far kinder and more sensible and a much greater economy were you to stop in time, try the value of rest and not wait until a long illness drifts you into the valley of the shadow. Every such illness drains your physical capital and detracts from your chances of long life and a vigorous age. Be wise in time. Three-fourths of the ills from which we suffer are preventable if relieved in the initial stages or if warded off when nature puts out her preliminary danger signals. Don't keep on your feet till you drop.

Orphan Children There are childless parents in this world and there are children whose parents have been taken from them. There are potential fathers and mothers to whom God never sent the blessing of a little one of their own. Others there are in whose hearts is the almost insupportable sorrow of a little vacant chair, of a small grave in the cemetery. George Macdonald once said that all children are God's children, and could we bear this in mind, those whose homes are empty would often fill them by the selection of an infant or an older boy or girl who might be taken from an orphanage and adopted into a real home.

MISS HELEN TAFT

THIS beautiful photograph is the latest picture taken of the daughter of President and Mrs. Taft. The daughter of the White House is interesting, as all young girls are, in her own right, and as her father's daughter has a claim upon the interest of us all. THE ROBIN'S SONG

Pretty robin redbreast,
So happy and so gay,
Sing to us a lullaby
At the close of day.

Said Mistress Robin
Redbreast,
Sitting in a tree,
"Yes, I'll sing a little song,
Just for you and me."

When she finished singing
Down to her nest she flew,
And there she sat till morning,
Watching her babies two.

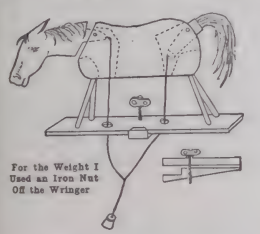
A SUNSHINY SHOWER

Little drops of water,
Dancing in the sun,
You could never, never count them,
Though they are falling one by one.



And when the dance is finished,
In the sky you'll see
Colors bright as diamonds,
Dancing merrily.

Something I Have Made Myself

Bobbing Horse—By R. Wayne Opp, age 15

THIS is a real German toy, and is so easily constructed that almost any boy that can whittle even a little bit can have one. If you are going to make one, first look carefully at the body of the diagram, which represents the inside surface of one-half of the whittled out body of the toy, which is made of two pieces of soft, smooth pine 3 x 6 inches, and 1 inch thick.

For the Weight I Used an Iron Nut Off the Wringer

Whittle out the wood between the dotted lines to the depth of one-half inch. Carve the head and tail from thinner pieces of pine. When your whittling is finished and the strings are put on as is indicated in the diagram, paste the halves of the body together and mount it firmly on four meat-skewer legs, fasten the horse on a small platform and clamp the whole to a table or window sill. I used a clamp and thumbscrew off of an old wringer, and got real horse's hair for the mane and tail of my toy.

DOLLY'S COMPLAINT

My name is Lady Ethel,
How d'y do, how d'y do?
My hair is curly yellow,
My eyes are glassy blue.

I came with gay old Santa,
Surely he should know my name;
And mother called me Ethel
That first day that I came.

Then she called me Shubelbabbit,
Queen Bess and Rosa Belle,
Then Dolly, Polly, Adeline,
And they did pretty well.

But since her fine French dolly came,
Oh, I think it is so mean!
She sets me in the corner,
And calls me Evergreen.

The Cozy Corner in Japan

COZY CORNER AUNT: Here in Japan the boys and girls have a special festival in May, which is called the Fifth Month Sekku. On that day the air is full of fishes made of bright paper many of them from 10 to 12 feet long. This fish-flying festival is a very old custom here, and even the Japanese do not understand it fully. But you know here in Japan, there are a great many little waterfalls, and sometimes there is a carp so strong that he swims even up the falls. This is considered very wonderful, and the Japanese parents want their children to be strong and courageous even when they meet with great difficulties.

MARKET

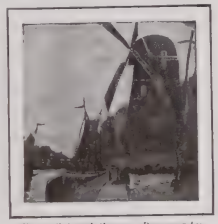
On my way to market,
One big, bright April day,
I took my little doll along
And tried to make it say:—

"Mama, mama, do hurry up,
It's going to rain, I fear;
Forwhen great clouds are rolling by
The thunder must be near."

LUCY L. MEIKLE, age 12.

NIGHT

The leaves are rustling gently
Through the boughs that seem to say,
Welcome the time when all is still,
And the stars come out to play.



The flowers and grasses whisper
As the cool breeze passes by,
And even the birds seem happier
When night is drawing nigh.

The Cozy Corner in Holland

DEAR Cozy Corner Aunt Janet: We live in California, but we are traveling in Holland, and the dear CHRISTIAN HERALD is forwarded to us every week. Holland is the quaintest country in the world, I do believe. In some places the villages and meadowlands are as much as thirty feet below the sea level. The waters are held back by enormous dikes. These dikes, father says, are among the wonders of the world. William, Prince of Orange, is the greatest hero of the Netherlands since the sixteenth century. The children of Holland still refer to him as Father William.

Lovingly, your little Cozy Corner Niece,
HELEN ARMITAGE.

THE BUTTERFLY

Butterfly, butterfly, stay with us, stay;
You are the fairest we've looked at to-day.
Who ever saw such a beautiful thing,
As if a rose had just taken wing?
No garden you 'll find half so lovely as ours;
So stay with us, play with us, here mid the flowers.

Butterfly, butterfly, where do you go
When it gets dark and the night breezes blow?
Close in a flower, do you shut up your wings
Until the fresh morning awakens all things?
No garden you 'll find half so lovely as ours;
So stay with us, play with us, here mid the flowers.

So many put the correct double letters at the end of the lines in the May 3 puzzle that we shall be publishing the names of those who got it all right on Honor Rolls for some time to come. If you did not receive the Cozy Corner prize, which for that week was a beautiful little booklet describing many frolics and games, be sure to send for one; or, if you are a newcomer to the Cozy Corner, and have not received an Everybody's Party Leaflet, write and ask for it, and one will immediately be forwarded to you.

I am glad you all liked the Friendship Garden Souvenirs. Any one who was overlooked may send for our very lovely Friendship Postal Cards.

Please, Ma'am, Have You Any Jap-a-lac?
I Can't Keep House Without It—

I'm very particular about my kitchen and with no disrespect to the girl who was before me—you 'll excuse me for saying it—it 's about time yours was fixed up.

The pantry shelves need a coat of Jap-a-lac badly. It will not only make them look nicer, but being like enamel they 're cleaned so much easier.

And the table needs coats of white Jap-a-lac, too. It costs less than oilcloth and don't need constant recovering. When a girl has a nice, bright, sanitary kitchen, she takes so much more pride in it; besides I like a kitchen fit to receive company in.

JAP-A-LAC

Made in 18 colors and natural (clear)—Renews everything from cellar to garret.

If you can get me some Oak Jap-a-lac, I can restore these old battered chairs. No need to buy new ones—they 'll seem just like the day you bought them. All you have to do is to wash off the dirt with a little bit of warm water and some soap, dry carefully and refinish.

The woodwork on the refrigerator looks awfully shabby, but in ten minutes I can change it into a new ice box.

What else can you use Jap-a-lac for? My last missus renewed her old furniture with it every spring and fall.

There 's a clear Jap-a-lac, called Natural, for that purpose, and it 's a splendid thing for hardwood floors, too. Dries very quickly and doesn't show heel-marks or footprints at all. She used it on her linoleum as well—kept it like new all the time—and if you could have seen her old bathroom after half a day's work with white Jap-a-lac on that tin bath tub—her husband thought she'd ordered an enameled one. She went over the woodwork, of course, and then silvered the pipes and the radiators with Aluminum Jap-a-lac.

Where can you get it? O! It's sold everywhere.

Thank you, ma'am, I'll have a lot of it sent up right away.

All sizes, 20c to $3.00
in Canada (imperal measure) 25c. to $3.50.

DEBBIE

By GEORGIA GLADYS WILLIAMS

"DEBBIE, have you seen my veil? I know I left it right here in this drawer." That was Marion's voice from across the hall.

"Debbie, have you any idea where my glove-buttoner is? Oh! here it is. You have my gloves? I was just looking for them. Oh, dear! there's that ripped place. I forgot all about mending it. Debbie, dear, would you mind sewing it up for me while I'm finding my purse? I'm five minutes late now. There's a good child." It was Beth this time.

"Oh, Debbie!" Edith's voice called from the hall below. "Do you happen to know where my parasol is? Why, Marion, you have mine; there's yours; and, Debbie, would you mind phoning to Brown's and telling them I've decided to take that piece of silk I was looking at yesterday? And tell them not to let anyone else have it. I'd do it myself, only I haven't time."

Debbie, from above, heard the front hall door open and close; then the sound of the girls' voices was borne from the street below, on the still June air, through the open window. She walked to the window, and watched them till they reached the corner, where they parted, Edith and Beth to attend a concert, and Marion on her way to an art lecture.

Debbie sighed as she began mechanically to put the disordered room to rights. As she stooped to rearrange the tumbled contents of an open drawer, she caught sight of her own round, rosy face in the mirror above; but the eyes that looked back at her were dark and troubled. In fact, this afternoon Debbie was not at all her usual gay, laughing, happy self; for yesterday something had happened, something which had turned Debbie's bright, rosy world into one of trouble and discontent.

She had been waiting in one of the department stores down town, for her package to be brought to her, when she had heard her own name mentioned. Turning, she had seen two ladies, strangers to her, standing by her side.

"Yes," one of them was saying, "Judge Mandell's daughters are certainly talented. They have inherited their father's intelligence and determination. The oldest is already an artist of considerable note, and the other two are gifted musically. Marion is one of the best pianists in town, and Beth has the sweetest voice of any girl I know."

"Why," inquired the other, "I thought there were four daughters. How about the other?"

"Why, yes," was the answer, "since you speak of it, I believe there is another daughter, a younger one. But I've never heard anything about her. I suppose she is only an ordinary girl."

As soon as Debbie had found that her family was the subject of the conversation, she had turned away, but she could not help hearing this much. Perhaps there was nothing particularly injurious in the words, but they had been a revelation to Debbie, and had caused her to look upon herself in a new light. She had walked out of the store with her cheeks burning and her head high. That night she had cried herself to sleep, and, as a result, in the morning she had wakened with a dull, throbbing headache. At the breakfast table her mother had inquired anxiously the cause of her pale cheeks and unusual silence; the girls had complained that she was cross; and her father had patted his youngest daughter's curly brown head, and declared that all she needed was a good long rest and vacation, which he would see that she should have this summer. Debbie had said nothing, for somehow she could not bring herself to tell of her experience of the afternoon before.

All day she had felt discontented and unhappy, and now she was glad that the girls were gone, for she could have the afternoon to herself, and look as miserable as she pleased, without any one to ask the reason.

"It's all true, too," she told herself bitterly, as she hung Marion's coat in its rightful place. "Marion was graduated first in her class at college, and Beth and Edith were both second, and they all received honors. Now, next fall Marion will enter her second year at art school, and already her pictures are selling well, and every one praises them. Beth and Edith will take a degree in music some day, and even now they are wanted on all the musical programmes. While I—there's absolutely nothing I can do. I'm not even 'intelligent,' as they are."

Debbie, who had received her high school diploma scarcely two weeks before, was thinking sorrowfully of the four long, hard years, with their half-learned lessons and frequent "red marks." Of course, the red marks were the result of Debbie's hearty dislike for study. There were so many other things to do, perhaps more important than lessons, certainly far more agreeable! Surely a gallop on one's favorite pony, out into the fresh country air, would do one more good than an hour's puzzling over an uninteresting Latin translation; and no one could deny that an hour spent in reading an interesting story was far more entertaining than working over tiresome geometry propositions.

Thus Debbie had reasoned, and had gone on her merry way. The teachers had been kind and patient. They had never reproved Debbie; no one could. To be sure, she had puckered her brows when she had seen her father's look of displeasure at the red marks. Then she had kissed him, promised solemnly that she would really try to do better next time, and then had run away to beg Jane to let her make his favorite pudding for dinner. The Judge had smiled as he had watched his daughter skip away, and wondered how long her good resolution would last. He had thought, too, sorrowfully, of the time when he must send her away to college. How could he get along without Debbie? Debbie who brought him his slippers at night, who read aloud to him when he was tired, and was silent and sympathetic when he was worried.

Debbie was thinking, too, how her fairy godmother might have given her just one tiny bit of talent, instead of overlooking her altogether. Even her name was queer and odd. What was there in "Deborah" to live up to? Now, if it had been Marion, she might have been tall and dignified; or, had it been Edith, she might have been sweet and pretty; or, had it been Elizabeth, she might have been witty and popular. As it was Debbie, she groaned. True, she knew she had been named for her Grandmother Mandell, and now she wished heartily that she had lived in those good old days when grandmother was young. Then a girl was not expected to be a genius, or even specially gifted. All that was required of her was to remain at home, learn to keep house and be busy, happy and contented.

"But it's no use," Debbie told herself with a final decisiveness. "Debbie Mandell is Debbie Mandell, and she can't be any one else. It's queer, though, that I never thought about it before. I've been proud of Beth and Marion and Edith, but the thought never occurred to me that I was expected to have some of the Mandell genius too."

The last stray collar and handkerchief had been put away, and Debbie's task was done. She decided to go downstairs and wear off her gloomy mood by attending to some long neglected letters. At the foot of the stairs she met her mother, pale and wan. Immediately Debbie was all anxiety.

"Mother, it isn't one of those dreadful headaches again?"

Mrs. Mandell put her hand to her head in feeble assent.

"You poor, darling little mother! You go right to your room and lie down, and don't you dare to stir until that headache has disappeared. I'll manage things downstairs."

Debbie slipped her strong young arm through her mother's and led her up the stairs and into her room. There she darkened the windows and stole softly out.

Downstairs again Debbie had scarcely seated herself at her desk when the telephone bell rang.

"That you, Debbie?" called her father's voice. "Tell your mother I'll bring company home for dinner. An old school friend I've met for the first time since we left college. We'll be around about the usual time."

Debbie hung up the receiver and turned to the clock. Just three hours till time for dinner. Well, she would go make arrangements with Jane now. No doubt that worthy personage would be much disturbed, and would declare that her rights were infringed upon by being called on to prepare for a guest at this late hour. Besides, it was Thursday, her evening out, Debbie reflected.

"But I can smooth things over," the young administrator declared. "I'll make some of the special dishes myself."

But at the kitchen door she stopped, amazed. No Jane was in sight, but on the table lay a piece of paper covered with scarcely legible black marks. Debbie knew, from experiences with former Janes, just what this meant. In the midst of her perplexities she laughed, as she scanned the blotted paper.

"Poor Jane! she thinks she's not allowed the freedom here she would have in some homes, and it's too hard to cook for a family with so many likes and dislikes. Well, this means trouble and worry for mother, when she is able to look for another servant, for Jane really was valuable; but, as for tonight, I'll manage that myself, and mother shall know nothing about it till morning. Her headache will have worn itself out by that time."

Debbie had already donned a big apron and rolled up her sleeves. In the excitement and planning of her work, she quite forgot her discontent of a short time before, and became the old happy Debbie again, humming snatches of gay little songs as she worked. Later in the afternoon she heard the girls returning, but no one came near the kitchen. At length Beth ventured to the door.

"Where are mother and Debbie, Jane?" she inquired.

The door leading to the cellar stood open, and from somewhere in the depths below came a muffled voice in reply.

"Mother has one of her headaches, and Jane has decided our family is not progressive enough to suit her, or else we're too progressive, I don't know which. Father is bringing company home for dinner, an old school friend of his, so I've taken possession of the kitchen kingdom. Whoever dares to enter therein becomes a subject of my will and pleasure."

"You don't mean Jane has left us?" Beth's tone was incredulous.

"Exactly. How quick you are to grasp the situation! But you'll be glad this has happened when you sit down to dinner. You'll wonder how you ever ate Jane's dinners at all."

"Well, you're a queer child. I don't see where you get your knack of always knowing what to do and when to do it. Is there anything I can do to help?" Beth looked about helplessly.

Debbie, coming up the stairs with her arms filled to overflowing, laughed at her sister's expression.

"No, my fair lady, everything is in readiness for the feast. I am on my way now to lay the banquet table, and bring out the silver plate of our worthy ancestors. Please go," she called back over her shoulder. "Really, I don't need you, and you'd only be in my way. Our songstress must save her strength and voice to entertain our distinguished guest to-night."

Debbie arranged the snowy linen and dainty china with skilful, loving fingers; then hurried back to the kitchen to put the finishing touches to her preparations there. When all was ready, she slipped off her apron, and was ready to take her mother's place at the table and act the part of hostess. Her father's guest, a city physician with a large practice, who himself had no daughters, proved lively and congenial, and soon made friends with all four girls.

"I'm sure, Mandell, you will pardon me," he remarked, in the course of the meal, "if I mention the fact that your wife must be unusually fortunate in the servant line. Now, if my wife could secure a cook who could get up such a meal as this, why, she would think she had stepped into Utopia."

Judge Mandell's eyes twinkled as he looked across the table at Debbie. "I have a faint suspicion," he began, "although our Jane is an invaluable helper, that this dinner is not entirely her production."

Debbie blushed as she offered her little explanation. Neither her father nor the Doctor said anything further on the subject, but the former looked pleased, and the latter bent his gaze on his plate and seemed absorbed in deep thought for several minutes before the conversation was resumed.

After the meal was over, the Doctor expressed a desire to see some of Marion's paintings, and the family bore him off in triumph to her little studio, only Debbie remaining behind to put things in readiness for breakfast.

Later, she slipped quietly into the circle, as they were assembled in the living room, and took her accustomed seat by her father's side. If the Doctor had been delighted with Marion's pictures, he was equally charmed with Beth's voice, and deeply appreciative of Edith's rendering of a difficult sonata on the piano. But later in the evening, when the other girls had said good night and gone to their rooms, leaving their father and the Doctor to talk over old times together, Debbie lingered behind a moment, as she stooped to give her father his customary good-night kiss.

"This is my little homemaker," the Judge told the Doctor proudly, as he held his daughter's hand.

"Yes," replied the Doctor, with just a note of wistfulness in his voice. "I had perceived that. A remarkable family you have, Judge, worthy of you in every respect. With two musicians, an artist, and two homemakers, you are a lucky fellow, Mandell. Do you know, in my opinion the greatest talent of all is that of home-making. In this day and age so few of our girls are trained for that. They either take up an art, or a profession, or go into business, or else all they care for is society. Doubtless, if the duty were laid upon them, they could be good home-makers, too, but this girl seems to love the art."

Debbie was mounting the stairs with a song in her heart and a glad light in her eyes.

The Andersonville Spring

IN a recent issue of THE MAIL-BAG there was printed an inquiry from C. H., Siloam Springs, Ark., regarding a spring which was reported to have broken out in Andersonville Prison in war time. We have received several letters on the subject.

C. R. Miles (formerly of Company I, 112, and Company K, 139 Illinois Infantry) writes: "This spring, which suddenly broke out in Andersonville prison, was thought by many to be divinely provided and was called 'Providence Spring.' It appeared just after a very heavy rainstorm which overflowed the banks of the creek and swept away a ridge of dirt made in digging the trench surrounding the grounds, and which had clogged the spring. It was a providence all right, for the water in the creek was fearfully nasty."

A. E. Collins, late sergeant Company A, 22d Michigan, writes: "I was in that prison from May 21, 1864, to April 20, 1865, and drank many times from the spring. The Confederates gave us lumber to make a chute, whereby the water was conducted within our reach. The spring furnished from three to five gallons per minute, and I understand it is flowing yet."

L. J. C., of Adrian, Mich., writes: "Rev. D. W. Sprinkle, who was one of the prisoners, wrote me a letter years ago in which he stated that on the 20th of August, 1864, fourteen men bowed in prayer to the Almighty to send them water, and a spring broke out on the outside of the wall and ran through the prison. The people there were unanimous in their belief that it was of divine origin. He saw it about five minutes after it happened. I learned recently that it was still flowing."

Others who have written interesting letters to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD on this subject, corroborating the existence of the spring either by personal testimony or through friends who had knowledge of it, are: Rev. Rudolph Caughey, Lincoln, Neb.; G. B. Merrow (G. A. R.), Rodessa, La.; W. S. Horton, late Company H., 5th Michigan Cavalry; J. B. Felton, Company B, 14th West Virginia; Judson W. Brush, Cedar Rapids, Ia.; and E. L. Miller, Ballston Spa, N. Y.

For the Indian Orphans' Sake

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and its readers, when India was visited by famine several years ago, took up the problem of orphan support. At one time, over 5,000 destitute and homeless little native children were provided for through the generosity of our friends and placed under the care of Christian missionaries for training and support. In the passing years many changes have taken place in the India orphanage work. Many of the children have grown up and have been sufficiently trained to be sent out to the world for self-support, some as teachers and evangelists, others as industrial workers or domestic servants. Death has called some away. There are now about 1,200 left of the original number, and these were the very youngest of all. They will be kept at the mission orphanages for a year or more to come. Funds are needed to help the general orphan work which has been so great a success in this large field. Any sums sent in behalf of the orphanages will be greatly appreciated and all will be acknowledged. Contributions should be sent to India Orphan General Fund, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York.

Questions and Answers

A. J. W., Neillsville, Wis. How long before Christ did Israel become a nation?

The national life of the Israelites may be said to have properly begun with the Exodus; see Ex. 3: 16 and 6th chapter, in which the Lord renewed his covenant and took them for a people. This was approximately 1491 years B.C.

O. P., Kimball, Neb. How would a person acting as his own lawyer in court conduct his case?

Very poorly, and it would be unwise for him to attempt it. Law, like all other professions, has its rules, its modes of procedure, its precedents, etc., and none but a trained lawyer could possibly be familiar with these or employ them to advantage. There have been rare instances where a man acted successfully as his own lawyer, but the reverse is so often the case that it has given rise to the rather sarcastic proverb: "The man who is his own lawyer has a fool for his client."

O. N. W., Granville, Minn. What is your explanation in regard to the "two witnesses" mentioned in Rev. 11th chapter? May not these two witnesses be upon the earth now?

The two witnesses (or, according to the Greek original, "the two witnesses of me") were impliedly two who were well known. They are described by symbol as the two "olive trees" and the two "candlesticks." Reference is here made to Zechariah 4: 3, 12, where two individuals (Joshua and Zerubbabel) were meant who ministered to the Jewish church. In the final apostasy, God will raise up two inspired witnesses to minister encouragement to his afflicted remnant. Interpretations differ concerning this passage, some holding that the two-fold church, Jewish and Gentile, may be meant. Moses was such a witness when he stood for God against Pharaoh, and so also was Elijah, who witnessed for God during a period of almost universal apostasy. The words "witnesses" and "prophecy" are usually applied to individuals. Some have held that Elijah and Moses will again appear, while others, with equal force, have held the two witnesses to be Enoch and Elijah, who, having been translated, have never yet died.

E. W., Parnassus, Pa. Please tell what results in better legislation have attended woman suffrage.

Judge Ben B. Lindsey says that he believes that Colorado has the best juvenile court law; the best child-labor law; the best laws for the prevention of cruelty to children and the enforcement of the obligations of fathers to support wife and child; and the best administration of these laws of any State in the Union, and that these laws, in his opinion, would not exist without woman suffrage. The same is said to be true of every one of the four suffrage States (woman suffrage in Washington, the fifth State, having just been introduced). Wyoming has been criticised because it has no child labor law. None is needed, as the education laws are fine and are strictly enforced.

T. S. S., Annville, Pa. 1. In one of John Fiske's books he speaks of the stories which tell why the mole is blind, why the fox has a bushy tail, etc. What stories are referred to? 2. In what poem of Tennyson's do the following lines occur:

"O me! for why is all around us here
As if some lesser god had made the world,
And had not force to shape it as he would?"

1. In the books of Joel Chandler Harris, in Rudyard Kipling's Jungle Book and other folk-lore books. 2. From the Idylls of the King ("The Passing of Arthur," lines 13-15.)

A. J. A., Collingwood, Can. What generation is meant in Mark 13: 30?

Commentators believe that this passage had prophetic reference to the destruction accomplished by Titus, or possibly even to the dispersion of the Jews later under Hadrian. In either case, every requirement of the prophecy would seem to be fulfilled. Your other question is too vague.

J. D., Lahoma, Okla. 1. Please explain who the two witnesses are spoken of in Rev. 11: 3. 2. What is meant by the "haystack prayer meeting"?

1. See the same question answered elsewhere in this issue. 2. The Haystack Meeting (the centennial of which was recently celebrated) took place in 1810, when a number of young theological students in Andover Seminary met in a grove but were driven by storm to seek shelter under a haystack, where the meeting was continued. This meeting led to the foundation of the American Board and was the germ of a great foreign missionary movement.

Mrs. V. J. H., Conway, Pa. Kindly give the names of some of the early missionaries?

We give a few of the earlier workers in modern missions: Schwartz, Danish missionary to India, 1762; Hans Egede, Norwegian missionary to Greenland, 1721; Zinzendorf, Moravian missionary, founded a chain of almost worldwide missions, beginning in 1731; William Carey, Baptist, of England, the father and founder of Baptist foreign mission work, began his great career in India, 1793; Dr. Coke was one of the pioneers of Methodist missions in America, and carried the work into many Western States, and also to parts of Canada, from 1780 to 1791. Harvard, Clough, Squance, Ault, Erskine and Lynch were Methodist pioneers in Ceylon, in 1814. Samuel Mills, Gordon Hall and James Richmond, with Messrs. Newell and Mott, were A. B. C. F. M. pioneers in India from 1812 to 1829. Bingham and Thurston were the first to go from the same society to the Pacific Islands. Ward, Judson and Rice were American Baptist pioneers in India. John and David Brainerd were Presbyterian pioneers among the American Indians from 1741 to 1796. Melville B. Cox was the first American M. E. Missionary to Liberia in 1832. The entire list of pioneers, American and European, would be too long to give here.

M. F. C., Rivera, Calif. Where in the Bible can I find the prophecy that the Jews, as a nation, will accept Christ as their Saviour?

See Rom. 11: 11-25. The final ingathering of the ancient people is taught in both the O. T. and N. T., and to this is generally added the belief that they will return as converts to Christianity. See also Psalm 14: 7; Isa. 59: 20.

W. E. D., Racine, Wis., and several others. The pamphlet, Jesus a Myth, to which you refer, is a foolish infidel fulmination, based probably on the utterances of the Karlsruhe professor, Drews, several years ago. Leaving Christian evidence aside, the existence and personality of Jesus on earth are sufficiently proved by the references of pagan historians, including Tacitus, Pliny, Lucian and Suetonius. But the strongest proof of all is in the Gemara—one of the Hebrew Talmudic books—which was practically a contemporary record. It contained the story of his birth, mission, arrest, trial, conviction and death, the names of several of his disciples and the names and testimony of the witnesses against him. These parts of the Gemara were ordered by a Jewish World Synod at Jaroslav, Little Poland, in 1631, to be omitted thereafter and a circle placed in their stead, which the initiated would understand. The reason for the omission was explained by the Synod to be that the persecutors of the Jews pointed to these passages which treated Christ's claims with incredulity and held them up as an excuse for persecution.

Mrs. A. D. P., Lincoln, Neb. What class in England is entitled to a crest or coat-of-arms? Are they used on stationery now? I know only those that bear the name can use them.

Crests and coats-of-arms are very ancient. Originally, the crest denoted the ornament worn on the helmet or shield. They are emblems of rank and family and a mark of "gentle blood." When knights wore armor and their features were concealed, armorial bearings or crests were a necessity, but that day has gone. All crests, armorial devices, family mottoes, etc., are hereditary. To decide who is entitled to use them, one should apply to the Herald's College, London.

E. B. B., Westhampton, Mass. 1. Can you tell me, approximately, what proportion of the population of the earth is civilized? 2. What proportion is living under Christian influences? 3. What proportion of those living under Christian influences may be said to be converted to Christianity?

1. The word "civilization" is a general term applied to the more advanced nations as contrasted with those that are looked upon as barbarians or savages. We term our country and the leading nations of Europe civilized; the Chinese and Tartars less so; the Red Indians, Australians and Esquimaux least of all. As civilization is a condition resulting from the establishment of social order in place of the individual independence and lawlessness of the savage and barbarous life, it may exist in various degrees, and so it is impossible to say even approximately what proportion of the world is civilized. 2. The total number of followers of Christianity, according to the latest statistics at hand, is 477,080,158. 3. We are unable to say what proportion of those living under Christian influences have become adherents.

G. H. Wilmington, Ill. 1. Your first question was recently asked and answered in THE MAIL-BAG. 2. Holiness is a progressive condition, as in the highest sense holiness belongs to God alone. Men are called holy, in as far as they are dedicated to God, and as they become vessels of the Holy Spirit. Sanctification is the divine grace which comes through Christ, first at conversion and by successive steps thereafter, under the influence of the Holy Spirit. It gradually works toward the complete deliverance of the believer from sin, as a part of the great work of redemption. In a general sense, sanctification comprehends the whole Christian life; but it is not to be forgotten that no Christian in this life attains absolute perfection. We are to lead holy lives, ever striving toward the mark, and sanctification purifies all our human imperfections.

Mrs. K. D., Macon, Mo. Please tell me the difference between the Continental Army and the Revolutionary Army.

The distinction between the Continental and the Revolutionary Army is as follows: the Continental Regulars of the War made up the Regular Army which was authorized by an act of the Continental Congress in 1775, and for this reason was called the Continental Army. The Revolutionary Army was composed of regular troops and volunteer troops, as the Volunteer Army of the Civil War comprised both the regulars and the volunteers.

Mrs. R. C., Pittsford, Vt. Please give me dates and information about the Atlantic cable.

"The first telegraphic cable across the Atlantic was completed August 5, 1858, the credit being mainly due to Cyrus W. Field, a rich merchant of New York. In the preceding March, 2,500 miles of wire were manufactured, and the laying of the line began at Valentia, Ireland. Two British and two American vessels were employed, but the cable broke twice and the vessels were obliged to return to Plymouth. A new start was made on the 20th of June, but operations were stopped by a severe storm. The next attempt was successful. 2,500 miles of wire were laid along the ocean bottom from Valentia to Newfoundland, and for the first time the Old World and the New were joined by submarine telegraph. On the evening of August 5, the English directors telegraphed to the directors in America: "Europe and America are united by telegraph. Glory to God in the highest; on earth, peace, good will toward men." A few minutes later Queen Victoria sent a message to President Buchanan, expressing her satisfaction at the completion of the undertaking so likely to preserve harmony between the two nations. The message was received at Newfoundland in about an hour after its transmission began. The event was celebrated with illuminations, military parades, salutes of artillery and a fusillade throughout the country of orations and speeches. But a disappointment soon came. The insulation was faulty, the difficulty increased, and on the 4th of September the wire ceased to work. In 1860 another company was organized, and the attempts to lay a cable were renewed. More trouble and failures followed; but complete success was attained in 1866, since which several cable lines have been laid and are in active work. Telegraphic communication is now complete around the globe."

Reader, Lincoln, Neb. What is "the order of Melchizedec" spoken of in Heb. 6: 20?

It was an order of perpetual priesthood. See Heb. 7: 3. This patriarch-priest, like Christ, united the kingship and the priesthood. He did not derive his power or authority from man, but from God alone, nor did he transmit it to other men, but remains a priest in perpetuity. Melchizedec's name signified the "righteous king," and Christ was himself the King of Righteousness. The city Melchizedec ruled was called the "city of peace," and Jesus is the Prince of Peace.

Miscellaneous

J. R. W., Santa Barbara, Calif. Second probation is nowhere taught in the Bible; it is a doctrine of the Roman Church and is repudiated by Protestants.

G. L., Elmwood, Neb. 1. Jesus was still a child when he was brought back from Egypt to be reared in Nazareth. (See Matt. 2: 23, etc.) 2. Never married.

P. S. G., Martin, Tenn. The Bible tells us not to be unequally yoked, and it also tells us to respect the law and the lawmakers. This is sufficient answer to the question.

W. D., Finley, N. D. The minister in question must have been misunderstood. Jesus was born in Bethlehem of Judea, of the line of David. The language of the common people at that time was probably Aramæan (a branch of the Syro-Arabic family of languages), not in its literary purity but in a mixed dialect.

L. P. L., Pasadena, Calif. Cocoa is produced from the dried and powdered shells of the cacao or chocolate tree. This is chocolate. Technically cocoa is that powder after the cocoa butter or most oily part has been extracted. This makes it more digestible than chocolate. The decoction made from it is a nutritious and fattening beverage. It is considered stimulating, as many other foods are. It contains no alcohol.

Reader, Darien, Wis. We have already explained that the opening chapter of Genesis is a brief general statement of the whole work of Creation, while the second chapter recapitulates, with greater detail, the narrative of the earth and of man's creation, being an expansion of the passages in the first chapter dealing with the same subject. They are not to be regarded as two versions, but as parts of the same version.

60 Years at Sunday School

GRANDMA CHAMBERS," as she is affectionately called in the neighborhood in which she lives, is unquestionably one of the oldest Sun-

"One of Ohio's Beloved Grandmas"

lay School pupils in the United States. She will be ninety-three years old next July, and when the Ohio State Sunday School Convention was held in Cleveland last year she was one of the speakers.

"Grandma Chambers" is really Mrs. Elizabeth Shreve Chambers, and her home is in Bayard, O. She has been a regular attendant at the Sunday School for sixty years, and she still has charge of her "infant class" in the Sunday School. She is a great believer in the value of the Sunday School as a Christian educational force and a real moulder of character. She also has great faith in the value of the printed tract. She joined the American Tract Society when she was sixteen years old, and has been a distributor of tracts ever since that time. Mrs. Chambers and her husband were promoters of Sunday School work in Ohio many years ago, and the development of the Sunday School in recent years has been a source of great pleasure to "Grandma Chambers." Few women of her years are so entirely at home in the saddle as she is. Simplicity of life, faith in God and mankind, service for others, and a cheerful disposition have been some of the secrets of the serene and healthful old age of this truly good "grandma."

Mother's Day at the Bowery Mission

THE Bowery Mission is blessed in the possession of a presiding mother. Mrs. Bird, for nearly seventeen years, has lived among and acted the part of a mother to the motherless men and boys of the mission. It was fitting therefore that on Sunday, May 14, a Mother's Day service should be held at Mrs. Bird's meeting.

The president of the Board of Trustees, the Rev. Charles H. Mead, was the principal speaker. The platform was filled with leaders and workers; the members of the Brotherhood were present in full force. Each member was possessed of the Mother's Day badge, a white carnation, and to each man present, not a member of the Brotherhood, was given a white rose, which was worn in honor of mother. What wonder, then, that at such a meeting the tenderest emotions were stirred!

Dr. Mead's first question was, "How many of you men have mothers living?" Very few hands were raised. Regretfully he said, "Is it possible? Well, will those of you who had good mothers raise your hands?" A forest of eager hands went up.

Those who are familiar with Dr. Mead's quaint style of eloquence, and his faculty of stirring the deep founts of feeling in the human heart, can well imagine, with a start like this, and such an audience to talk to, what a blessed time followed. His touching tribute of gratitude to his own mother made many of the poor fellows bow their heads. The testimonies that followed were profoundly touching. One especially made a deep impression. It came from an elderly man in the crowd—a respectably-dressed habitué of one of the better class lodging-houses. He said it was many years since his mother died, but she had been his best friend, and he felt that even now she was nearer to him in spirit than any one else. Many a night, lying awake on his lodging-house bed, he found it a comfort to think of his mother.

Whilst this service was being held, the superintendent, Dr. Hallimond, was the principal speaker at a large Mothers' Day meeting in Washington, D. C., held under the combined auspices of the Y. W. C. A. and the Y. M. C. A. Here he spoke of the large part a mother's love and influence play in the salvation of Bowery men, and gave many instances of men who have been reclaimed through the instrumentality of a mother's patient prayers.

"AS A MAN THINKETH"

THE lavish lustrums of my life go by
With pageantry devoid of dearth and dole;
Laughter and peace is painted on the scroll,
And love, immortal love, too deep to die;
The years have sung me songs without a sigh;
Poured nectars at rich feasts for sense and soul,
Nor taxed me aught of tribute, task or toll.
Time has but one intent—to glorify.

But this is so because I think it so;
I drape my world in dreams of what should be.
Mine eyes look out across the years of woe,
And only glad-faced flowers of blessings see;
Though with a Cross to Calvary I go,
The road is glorious through Gethsemane.

Paint Is Cheaper Than New Buildings

You know how quickly a building that never saw paint goes to rack and ruin.

The boards rot around the nails, they crack and warp.

Only constant repair keeps the building standing.

An occasional coat of good paint made with

"Dutch Boy Painter" White Lead and real linseed oil will save your buildings and reduce repair, to say nothing of improving the looks of the place.

Decide to use "Dutch Boy Painter" White Lead this spring. It's a mighty good investment.

Write for our "Helps No. 2050" which will tell you why, how, with what and when to paint.

A TRUE PATRIOT*

Sunday School Lesson by Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

HEZEKIAH the Good—so we must call him because of the power he was for good over the Hebrew nation. The fact that he was a good man rolls away the stone of bad heredity and proves that there is a chance in this world for those who have bad ancestors. The father of Hezekiah, King Ahaz, was one of the worst of men. It is said of him that he was a gross idolater, and even sacrificed his children to the gods (II. Chron. 28: 3). He remodeled the temple to fit it for idolatrous rites. He kept chariot horses dedicated to the sun. But there was a good mother in the case. Her name was Abijah. She was the daughter of the prophet Zechariah, who had been a faithful counselor of King Uzziah (II. Chron. 26: 5).
